Fishbaum, who has been a coach with the team for 14 years, said the Tigers' two regular season losses were the best thing that could have happened to the team, because it helped them stay focused and prevented them from being overconfident.

Strategy also played a role in the Tigers' success as the team was taught to hit singles and to make things happen on the base paths, not just swing for the fences.

"We emphasize for them to hit singles, because if they try for a home run then half the time they'll end up popping up," said CHAT's other coach, Simon Wolle.

The two coaches compared this winning season to a Disney film, ending with the hoisting of a banner in the gym, representing the Tigers' seventh TDCAA title in recent years.

"The goal from the beginning of tryouts was to win a championship," said Fishbaum. "The hard work and focus really paid off and it was a great season from the guys who had a great work ethic."

In praise of the Jewish community worker

This column is dedicated to the career and life of the late Eva Landa.

As a child, the Shabbat table was always a magical place. Every Friday night, my family would sit together, eat the grand victuals my mother had prepared and listen to tales of my father's rabbinical adventures. Through his dramatic presentations and twisting themes and plots, we discovered early on that life in the home of a Jewish civil servant was thrilling and scary, but always rich.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Over the last decade, I have worked with dozens of community workers who have made sacrifices and worked arduously to enhance the Jewish community of Toronto and the State of Israel.

Two such individuals are Gordy Wolfe, the executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service who is retiring this summer, and his late colleague, Eva Landa, formerly JF & CS's director of finance and administration.

Their work was holy, because we entrusted them with the souls and welfare of our families and they responded responsibly and brilliantly.

As in any other profession, there are rabbis in our community who operate in a magical way, and there are, of course, others who are spiritually and administratively mediocre. Yet, I am certain, that almost every Jew who belongs to a shul has a story of how their rabbi stayed up nights with a dying relative or ran to their home to soothe the pained hearts of their family. Rabbis are generally strong and directed human beings who empathize with their congregants. They are troupers.

We live in a time when it's in vogue to honour our volunteer leadership and donors with plaques and large signage. I'm not sure how Jewish this approach is, but it's clear that we have the notion of "kavod" (honouring) down to a virtual science.

I suggest that it's time we use some of our know-how in this area to do the same for our community workers – men and women who often work at non-market salaries, but more often than not hold the key to the community DNA that makes up our character.

This, I believe, applies to our day-school and afternoon-school teachers and rebbes, as well as to our synagogue staff, programmers, directors, frontline staff, fundraisers, administrators and anyone else on the community payroll.

It would be so invigorating and inventive if the Toronto Jewish community took the lead in the Jewish world in this area and implemented programs such as: annual awards and/or scholarships for community workers who have acted splendidly on our behalf; setting aside one Shabbat during the year, called the "Jewish Community worker Shabbat," for shuls and organizations to honour their staff; and regularly highlighting the careers of our community workers in Jewish media outlets.

The history of the Toronto Jewish community is a superlative one. One only has to wade through the boxes of Jewish material in our archives to discover the names and successes of Jewish volunteers and civil servants who have rolled up their sleeves together and fought for the autonomy, betterment and safekeeping of our community.

Over the last few decades, we have mastered ways of paying homage to one side of that partnership – the volunteers and the donors. For the sake of justice and appreciation, it's time to launch a concerted effort to honour our other better half – the Jewish community worker.

Yasher koach to all the community workers for what we have and who we are. Your work was and is holy, and you have given us much pleasure, pride, security and joy.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My 32-year-old son and his wife have decided to split up. I could have told you from the beginning that this marriage was doomed. Heather is high maintenance. It's not enough that she has it all, she always has complaints. Heather and I have never seen eye to eye, but now that she and Jerry are splitting, I don't know where I will fit in the new picture.

My grandson and I are very close. Heather was always thrilled to have me visit because it meant she could go have her hair or nails done while I babysat.

Justin, my grandson, is two years old and will suffer greatly from this breakup. How will I be able to continue my relationship with him if my son and Heather are always fighting?

Worried Bubbie

Dear Worried Bubbie

I presented your problem to members of Chai chapter of the National Council of Jewish Women. Here are some suggestions.

The first thing you failed to mention in your letter is your relationship with your son. Obviously he will play a very important role in your visitation with Justin as you will be able to see him when it's Jerry's time with his son. That being said, don't burn your bridges with Heather. Although you may not get along that well with her, she will still need a reliable babysitter, and there is nothing like a bubbie for that. She will never find someone who has Justin's best interest at heart, and the price is right! Offer your services as often as you can.

In any worst-case scenario, remember that you also have rights. In Canada, several advocacy and self-help groups have been formed, including GRAND (Grandparents Requesting Access and Dignity) and the Canadian Grandparent Rights Association.

Hopefully, Heather will put Justin's welfare before her own issues. The feeling of love, family and belonging is crucial to a child, particularly when his immediate family is so fragile. His relationship with you should not be broken, especially now. Justin's life would not be as full without it.

The time is now!

Members of the recently returned Prime Minister's Mission to Israel are urging the entire community to join a UJA Federation monthly mission to personally express their solidarity.

"As I met face to face with Israelis, I understood the enormity of Israel's crisis, especially the social service emergency with which Israel is confronted," said Allan Silber, who chaired the trip with Richard Venn and Barbara Bregman. "We have an obligation to recognize this crisis and respond to it."

Israeli Cabinet Minister Natan Sharansky commended Toronto's Jewish community. "I'm not surprised that this year, Toronto, through UJA Federation, sent more missions of solidarity than any other city in the world...that definitely deserves a standing ovation for Toronto."

BITAN AHARON, Israel — In July 1927, Menahem Mendel Ussishkin, president of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), and Archibald (Aharon) Freiman of Ottawa, president of the Zionist Organization of Canada (ZOC), asked the ZOC to buy a stretch of land between Netanya and Hadera, known as Emek Hefer, for Jewish settlers.

At a time when Canadian Jewry only raised $25,000 a year for the JNF, the asking price, $1 million (US), was so enormous that Ussishkin and Freiman initially did not dare to mention it to the 1927 Zionist Convention delegates. It was only after a fierce debate that they voted – unanimously – to redeem the land.

Israel's image on CIC agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The board of directors of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) will meet later this month to consider a comprehensive strategy aimed at improving Israel's image with the Canadian public.

Although details remain sketchy, the strategy could include creation of a speaker's bureau, more organized missions to Israel for policy-makers, and other steps that would highlight the shared values of the two democracies.

Shimon Fogel, the CIC's chief executive officer, said broadening the scope of the lobby group's work will require a substantial infusion of cash, but it appears a group of community philanthropists are ready to carry much of the load. Already in the 2002-03 fiscal year, the CIC saw its funding increase by 60 per cent. Other groups involved in advocacy, whether they address anti-Israel sentiment on campus or rising anti-Semitism, will likely also see their budgets enhanced, Fogel said.

The stepped-up efforts to counter the erosion of Israel's public image and the disturbing growth in anti-Semitism was pushed by an emergency cabinet of UIA Federations Canada, a national umbrella organization that distributes funds raised by local communities for Israel.

Canada

Meeting Held

OTTAWA — Representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Association of Romanian Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust (ARJSH) were invited to a meeting last month with Romania's ambassador to Canada, Liviu Maior, after a Romanian government official denied the existence of the Holocaust in wartime Romania. "Although senior government officials in Romania quickly retracted this claim and openly acknowledged the pogroms in Romania and the mass expulsions of Romanian Jews to death camps… we wanted to convey our dismay over this incident directly to the ambassador and discuss how we can move forward," ARJSH President Issie Veisfeld said.

Sharon to Visit Oslo

JERUSALEM — Israel's prime minister will discuss the peace process with Norwegian prime minister Kjell Magne Bondevik. Ariel Sharon will travel to Oslo on July 16 at Bondevik's invitation. The visit will mark Sharon's first official trip there since his election.

Ape Ceasefire

JERUSALEM — An Israeli zoo is sending four baboons looking for love to a Palestinian zoo. The four baboons were getting into fights for mates at the Rishon Lezion animal park, due to a shortage of available females, the daily Ma'ariv reported. After brief negotiations, the management decided to send the primates to a zoo in the West Bank city of Kalkilya, where their luck might change.

Investigation Concluded

JERUSALEM — The bulldozing death of a pro-Palestinian activist in the Gaza Strip was accidental, an Israeli military investigation concluded. Rachel Corrie, an American member of the International Solidarity Movement, was killed in March while trying to prevent an Israeli bulldozer from demolishing the home of a Palestinian terrorist.

Mosque Demolished

NAZARETH — Muslims in Nazareth largely ignored a call last Wednesday for a general strike to protest the demolition of a mosque next to the Church of the Annunciation, one of the holiest sites in Christianity. The call was issued by the Waqf, or Islamic Trust, to protest the demolition of the unauthorized, partially built mosque, which had enraged Christians around the world. Police detained several Muslims protesting near the site who allegedly threatened owners of nearby businesses if they didn't close.

World

Cleric Speaks on Terror

LONDON — A Muslim cleric with ties to the Iranian leadership has condemned the killing of civilians "of any faith, whether Jewish, Muslim or Christian." In a letter to the Daily Telegraph newspaper, Sayed Safavi, whose brother is head of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, also implicitly recognized the State of Israel and called for religious leaders to have a "major role" in promoting peace between peoples. It is rare for a hard-line Iranian cleric to make such a declaration. Safavi did not explicitly condemn suicide bombings, as some Jewish leaders hoped, but said, "For Muslims to kill civilians unconnected with any attack on them is a crime."

Teen Racism

ROME — Nearly one-quarter of Italian teenagers harbour anti-Semitic views, according to a new survey. More than 50 per cent of Italian teens aged 14-18 held negative views of Muslims, according to the survey, sponsored by the Union of Italian Jewish Communities. More than one-third of respondents harbour generally racist attitudes, the survey said. The highest levels of racism were seen among teens who lived in northern Italy, are deeply religious or are right wing.

Rabbi for 'Crypto-Jews'

LISBON — Portugal's "crypto-Jewish" community is welcoming a full-time rabbi. Rabbi Elisha Salas of Chile has been sent to Portugal by the Jerusalem-based Amishav organization, which seeks to return lost Jews to Judaism. Ancestors of the crypto-Jews were forcibly converted to Catholicism during the Inquisition. Rabbi Salas is to be based out of the city of Belmonte, where some 150 crypto-Jews converted to Judaism in the early 1990s.

Denier Loses Appeal

SYDNEY — A Holocaust denier in Australia lost his appeal against a court ruling forcing him to remove his Web site. Fredrick Toben claimed on his site that the Holocaust had never taken place. Jeremy Jones, head of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, called last week's decision "a significant victory for all those concerned with human rights in Australia."

Hitler Tourism

BERLIN — Germany may expand a museum at Hitler's former mountain retreat because of tourist interest. The finance minister in Bavaria said he would seek additional funding to build an extension at the site in Berchtesgaden. As many as 1,500 tourists a day are visiting the site in southern Germany, officials said.

Governor Fires N.J. Poet Laureate

TRENTON, N.J. — New Jersey Gov. James McGreevy signed a bill last week to eliminate the state's poet laureate job after the current holder, who said in a poem Israel knew in advance about the Sept. 11 attacks, would not quit.

The state assembly earlier approved a bill cutting the $10,000 (US) stipend for the post after Amiri Baraka refused calls by McGreevy to resign, Associated Press reported.

Baraka, who as a black radical in the 1960s espoused anti-Semitic views, stirred controversy after taking the job last July with his poem Somebody Blew Up America. It reads, in part: "Who knew the World Trade Center was gonna get bombed/ Who told 4,000 Israeli workers at the Twin Towers/ To stay home that day/ Why did Sharon stay away?" a reference to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Baraka denies the poem accuses Israel of carrying out the attacks and says it actually criticizes anti-Semitism. But in a posting on his Web site about a recent New York Times scandal involving a reporter who fabricated and plagiarized material, he accuses Sharon of being unhappy with the paper for "not being the NEW YORK ZIONS" and refers to "supposedly crypto-Zionists doped up on being Satanic Insiders."

Baraka has threatened to sue the state for slander and for violating his First Amendment free speech rights, but McGreevy has said he will sign the bill.

Sociologist questions Jewish population study

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

One of Canada's foremost experts on Jewish population trends is questioning how community officials have interpreted the results of the 2001 census – as well as their motives for doing so.

Prof. Leo Davids, a sociologist at York University, says Jewish federations may have artificially inflated the number of Jews in Canada "in order to make themselves look more powerful and effective."

The 2001 census found nearly 330,000 Jews by religious affiliation in Canada. It also tallied 348,605 Canadians with "Jewish" listed as one of up to four ethnic origins, even if they listed "no religion."

But community leaders and planners have traditionally relied on neither figure. The two were blended by UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) in its recently released National Demographic Study to show 370,520 Jews in Canada as of 2001.

Excluded from the total are only those who reported their ethnic origins as Jewish, but who professed another religion.

Davids says the study's inclusion in its total of thousands of people with no religious affiliation but with multiple ethnic origins – at least one being Jewish – is dubious, because their ties to the community are weak, if they exist at all.

"In North America generally, Jewishness has meant behaviour that sustains a community," he told The CJN. "The vast majority of those claiming Jewish as a religion are likely to do something, whether it's donate to causes or march or be involved.

"But someone with mixed ethnic origins and no religion… the reality is that Jewish continuity isn't likely to come from them. What happens when you count people who do nothing? What's the point of counting them?" he asked.

Davids, who for decades has tracked the use of Hebrew and Yiddish in Canada, among other trends, said he can accept the inclusion of those with no religion and with a single ethnicity of Jewish (or Jewish and "Canadian.")

But he objects to counting those who list multiple ethnic origins (one being Jewish) and no religious affiliation. Including them in the total "is stretching it. Maybe the argument can be made for inclusion, but only if there's outreach to this group."

He said federations' inclusion of this group in the total is part of "a political strategy to puff up the numbers.

"The federations are in the positive vibes business and they have to sell a certain image to donors. They can go around saying there are 370,000 Jews in Canada, [but] another set of numbers shows there are 40,000 less than that."

He said the difference between the two categories is especially acute in Vancouver, where the number of Jews by religion in 2001 was just over 17,000, but the official count is given as 22,585 – a 33 per cent discrepancy.

In Toronto, "religious" Jews numbered 164,510, but the UIAFC tally is just over 179,000.

"It's part of the whole question of who is a Jew," Davids said. "Can we accept a blended definition, or are [the federations] miscounting?"

Charles Shahar, the Montreal-based author of the National Demographic Study, defended the inclusion of those with no religion but with multiple ethnic origins that include Jewish.

"We would rather be inclusive than exclusive. We're trying to get a handle and information on as many different types of Jews as we can," Shahar said.

He said Davids would have a hard time questioning the Jewishness of a respondent who had no religion but who listed "Moroccan" or "Polish" as his or her ethnic origin in addition to "Jewish."

"I don't see why that would make them less of a Jew," Shahar said.

Similarly, "what about someone who's a fervent Zionist, but whose religious ties are lacking. Should they be excluded? Just because a person is not [religiously] affiliated doesn't mean they're not Jewish."

Shahar said the figures cross-tabulating Canadians who gave "no religion" with those who listed single-Jewish versus multiple-

Anti-Semitism's collateral damage

From the editor's desk

Israeli security officials are meeting regularly at this juncture in the tentative road map peace process to try to co-ordinate security measures.

Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas does not have full authority over the security apparatus of the Palestinian Authority. PA President Yasser Arafat made certain of that in the days before the cabinet was reconfigured to ostensibly grant upon Abbas "real" prime ministerial authority. Whatever the extent of his authority, however, Abbas must prove to the American administration, and, more importantly, to the Israeli people, that he is sincere when he says he condemns terror and yearns for a peace treaty with Israel. The only way he can prove the bona fides of his sincerity is by trying to eliminate the terror apparatus within Palestinian society.

There are two components to this task.

The first is to completely deconstruct and then reconstitute the Palestinian educational system. This must include every public medium in which instruction and example are transmitted, both formally and informally: the classroom, the media and the mosque.

The message that must be the irreducible core of the new system is this: Jews have a right to live in the Middle East, too. Therefore, accommodation with the Jewish state is both possible and desirable.

The second component of eliminating the terror apparatus in Palestinian society is the dismantling of the existing terrorist infrastructure. Unfortunately, it appears there is no way to do this other than by force of arms, for Hamas, Islamic Jihad, the Al Aksa Martyrs Brigade, the Tanzim and other like-minded Palestinians will not willingly submit to their own dissolution.

There is no other way to convince Israelis that the Abbas PA is serious about peace other than by removing the individuals who abhor the very idea and threaten it most directly and fervently.

Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon appears to want Abbas to succeed. He has been going out of his way to provide important, though qualified, publicly broadcast symbols of support for his Palestinian counterpart, including transferring military control from the Israel Defence Forces to the Mohammed Dahlan-controlled PA security forces in Gaza and Bethlehem, easing travel and economic restrictions on Palestinians, meeting with Abbas in Jerusalem and releasing Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails.

The extent to which Arafat no longer rules the PA will be the extent to which the chances increase that Abbas can succeed – providing, of course, that Abbas is sincere.

In the nearly three years since Arafat launched his terror war against Israel, the toll of Israelis dead and injured has been staggering.

From Sept. 29, 2000 to June 30, 2003, 814 people in Israel were killed and 5,603 were injured. During that time, Palestinian terrorists committed 18,145 attacks against the Israeli people. The proportionate figure in Canada would be 4,070 people killed. The proportionate number in America would be 40,700.

Of the 814 killed, 570 were civilians and 244 were members of security forces. Of the 5,603 people injured, 3,952 were civilians and 1,651 were from the security forces.

Of the 18,145 total attacks, 7,696 were committed in the West Bank, 9,716 in the Gaza Strip and 733 were committed within the Green Line.

To the casualties on the Israeli side, of course, must be added the more than 2,000 Palestinians killed and the many thousands more who were wounded as a result of the IDF's actions in defence of the Israeli people.

This staggering loss of life is directly attributable to Arafat. The violence he unleashed was an abject repudiation of every peacemaking principle of the Oslo accords, and utterly unnecessary. For, in the end, there will perforce be a return to the same negotiating table he left.

In addition, as we have noticed with increasing shock and dismay, the fighting between Israelis and Palestinians has spawned a progeny from hell: after nearly 50 years of respite, anti-Semitism as a galvanizing social movement has reappeared.

Crude, illogical, and ever brutal, this anti-Semitism has created an entirely new situation of vulnerability for many Jewish communities around the world.

Except in isolated instances – most notably Iran and parts of Yemen – Jews are no longer captives of their host state. They are generally free to travel wherever they wish.

Notwithstanding this freedom, however, Jews are not free from the possibility of violence and terror against themselves and their institutions. Authorities familiar with the security needs of Diaspora Jewish communities emphasize this point constantly.

The May suicide bombings in Casablanca, for example, were aimed specifically at Jews and their institutions. Of this, there is no doubt, even though Moroccan media did not portray the attack in this way. That there were no Jewish casualties among the 44 people killed was simply a result of bad planning by the terrorists, who chose to explode themselves and their bombs on Friday night when most of the Jews of the neighbourhood were off the streets and in their homes.

Much like the attack a year earlier against a Djerba synagogue, the bombings in downtown Casablanca came as a great shock to local authorities, who thought, foolishly, they were exempt from being targets. But they too became the collateral damage of the ominous, new anti-Semitism.

Israeli centre focuses on helping women

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Mazal Renford continues meeting, talking and working with Israeli Arab and Palestinian women because she is afraid to stop.

If discussions with the "other side of our society end, it will be very difficult to start again and the reality of our lives in this region is that we have to live together," she said in an interview while in Toronto on her way to Montreal for the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, plenary.

Renford is the director of the Golda Meir Mount Carmel International Training Center in Haifa (MCTC), an institute devoted to improving the condition of women around the world.

Founded in 1961 by MASHAV, the Center for International Co-operation of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs, MCTC offers educational programs that help women from transitional societies become active in the development of their communities.

After a visit to newly established African states in 1958, Golda Meir established the centre as a way to help close the gaps between developed and developing countries. At that time, Meir felt that Israel could play an important role in assisting other nations because of its own struggles and achievements since it gained its independence 10 years earlier.

MCTC now operates programs in 147 different countries in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Mediterranean region, as well as in central and eastern Europe. The projects vary, depending on the continent, country and community. Some focus on the grassroots level and others on top management.

"Our goal is not to dictate projects, but to help people think together to find a solution to their problems," said Renford, who has a master's degree in political science and business administration. "They know better than anybody what is needed and best for them.

"Even if a project is a tiny one, we don't ignore it because it could give a family an opportunity to struggle against poverty."

Israel has successfully integrated immigrants and refugees from all over the world and can share the knowledge gained from that experience, the Moroccan-born Israeli said. And while some communities, like those in Senegal, have welcomed her, others have not.

Renford said the past few years have been challenging, both in Israel and abroad. In Israel, it has become difficult for Palestinians and Israelis to meet because roadblocks have created physical barriers that are difficult for the Palestinians to cross. In addition, terrorism and suicide bombings have produced emotional barriers that are painful for Israelis to overcome.

Renford, who represents Israel on the UNESCO-backed Mediterranean Women's Forum, described how difficult it has been to represent Israel at international conferences since the second intifadah began. After many years of struggle, Israel is now included as a member state of the Mediterranean Women's Forum alongside 16 other listed countries, including Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon and Palestine.

"Two years ago, I was invited by France to be part of a colloquium on non-violence," she said.

"At that time, I was hoping to engage Leila Shahid, the Palestinian representative, in a meaningful discussion."

However, she said, "while I spoke about overcoming hatred and areas of mutual cooperation, Leila spoke about Israeli cruelty and the territories. She didn't say one word about non-violence."

Renford said she pushed for dialogue with Shahid and has since had ongoing discussions with the PA representative in France.

"If representatives at conferences – those with higher education – can't speak together, how will we ever expect the local people in our area to dialogue?"

"Since we don't deal with political issues, our centre can try to make people think and discuss what educators, women and mothers can do to change the mentality of people towards peace, tolerance, and acceptance of the other. It may sound utopian, but we can't stop doing it because we must never give up," she said.

Israeli tourism showing signs of recovery

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As "lights at the end of the tunnel" go, it's still pretty faint, but it appears the Israeli tourism industry is showing signs of life after two disastrous years.

Visits to Israel are increasing and Canadians are booking summertime flights in numbers that are beginning to resemble pre-intifadah levels.

Israeli tourism officials are forecasting that one million visitors will travel to Israel in 2003, up from 880,000 the year before. The Ministry of Tourism reported that hotel stays in May stood at 1.9 million, up three per cent from 2002 figures.

Still, travel to Israel is miles away from 2000 – a record year in which 3.2 million tourists visited the Jewish state.

Canadian numbers parallel the broader international trend, with as many as 30,000 visitors expected to visit in 2003, said Dani Shahal, Israel's consul for tourism and director of the Israel Government Tourism Office in Toronto.

That figure snaps a two-year trend of declining numbers. In 2002, only 26,000 Canadians visited Israel and 35,000 visited in 2001. A record 55,000 travelled to Israel in 2000, he said.

The general manager of El Al's Canadian operations, Stanley Morais, is also witnessing increased demand. Last week, the Israeli national airline announced it was adding a Boeing 777 direct flight on Mondays from Toronto to Tel Aviv. El Al flies high capacity Boeing 747-400s on Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday each week and it books its passengers on board Air Canada flights to Israel on other days pursuant to a code-share agreement.

"The flights are very busy," and are operating at more than 90 per cent capacity, said Morais.

The majority of passengers appear to be Jewish, he said, with a smaller number of Christian groups travelling as well.

Morais said people who have delayed travel to Israel for several years as the violence raged are now taking their families for visits. "There appears to be a psychological acceptance of the situation and people are saying, 'I can't stay away from Israel any longer.'"

A recent terrorist attack that claimed 16 lives on a Jerusalem bus failed to deter passengers, with not one person cancelling, he added.

Morais, who is taking his family on vacation there, said recent visitors are telling their friends that life appears to be returning to normal.

Shahal agreed with that assessment. "Many people visiting Israel lately have the impression that Israelis are leading their lives, going to the beaches and restaurants."

The changing political atmosphere in the Middle East might also be attracting visitors, who see peace talks unfolding and believe "that maybe the situation will calm down," he added.

Shahal said Canada ranks fifth or sixth in passenger traffic to Israel, behind the United States, France and Britain.

Parents group hands out awards to teachers

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Twelve Jewish day school teachers were recognized recently by a group of Toronto parents for their excellence in teaching.

The awards, called the Teacher of Excellence awards, are handed out annually by an independent parents' group called the Teacher of Excellence committee and are valued at $1,000 each. Eight teachers received individual awards, and four teachers shared two awards. This is the second year the committee has given out the awards.

Catherine Gitzel, spokesperson for the Teachers of Excellence committee, said the parents were looking for a way to say thank you to outstanding teachers.

"It's a time when teachers receive a lot of badmouthing, so this is a positive way of saying we appreciate all you do," she said.

Gitzel, who was hired privately by the committee to manage the awards process, said the financial backers of the awards don't want to be named.

"According to the Torah, the best way to give of yourself is to give anonymously," she said.

The Teacher of Excellence committee placed ads in The CJN and notified the parents' associations at the day schools, asking parents to nominate their favourite teachers by writing letters. They received more than 60 letters, and the finalists were chosen by a group of five parent volunteers.

They were looking for teachers who demonstrated excellence inside and outside the classroom. One teacher made science class understandable, while another visited a sick child in the hospital.

Jewish population study

Jewish ethnic backgrounds won't be known for a while.

Also of interest to Shahar is the number of people who, although not included in the total, listed Jewish ethnicity but another religion.

He said he would like to know how those religions break down – whether they are mainstream faiths, such as Christian – or "para-religious" ones such as paganism, Native spirituality and various New Age movements.

Shahar said it will be interesting to know how many people embrace New Age spirituality but still cling to Jewish origins, and whether they are open to involvement in the community.

As well, the category "no religion" included agnostics, atheists and humanists. Shahar said there are a good number of secular humanists who claim Jewish affinity.

Davids, meantime, cautions that the four per cent increase in the overall number of Jews between 1991 and 2001 was driven mainly by haredim, who typically have large families.

If you take out the haredim, "the rest of the community is actually shrinking," he said.

Low Jewish fertility rates among non-chassidic families and levelled-off immigration from traditional sources, such as the former Soviet Union and South Africa, are to blame, he said.

Will no cleric speak?

On Sunday, two women hiding explosives on their bodies blew themselves up at a crowded outdoor rock festival in Moscow. They killed 14 people and injured scores more. It is suspected that Muslim extremists were responsible for the carnage. On Friday, suicide attackers entered a Shia mosque in Pakistan and, following the same macabre modus operandi, killed some 37 people while they were at prayer. Sunni Muslim extremists were suspected.

In early May, suicide bombers struck in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, also killing some 37 people. Later that same month, suicide bombers killed 44 people in Casablanca, Morocco. In both attacks, Al Qaeda Muslim extremists were the perpetrators.

For nearly a decade, of course, suicide bombing has become the preferred order of battle against Israelis. Indeed, an entire generation of Palestinian children has now grown up revering suicide bombers as "martyrs." But true to the warnings of the Jews, the evil that struck first at Jews, strikes now at others as well. For it is in the nature of evil to always do evil. It knows no other way because that is both its means and its end.

Why, then, do we not hear from Muslim clerics, locally or abroad, publicly, loudly, unambiguously condemning suicide bombings. Without such condemnation, slight are the chances that the evil will desist.

Tribute to a nurse

In many cultures, the term "sister" is still used for one who is a nurse in a hospital. The origin for this traces back to the ecclesiastic roots of the modern hospital system. In a profound way, "sister" helps us to better understand the intimate nature of the nurse's duties and the generally unquestioned dedication devoted by most nurses to those duties, as if the patient were family.

Nelia Laroza was a sister to the desperately sick patients at North York General Hospital in Toronto, many of them with SARS. She tended to them, cared for them and, in most cases, nursed them back to health. But it was the tragic melancholy of her fate that she would contract the dreaded virus from one of the people she was nursing. The virus would eventually choke off the systems that sustained her own life.

Last week she died.

Nelia Laroza was the first health-care worker in Canada to die of SARS. She fell in the line of duty.

Despite the great risks to her own life and her daily fears concerning those risks, she "soldiered on," continuing to minister to the needs of her patients, nursing them with dignity and dedication. We pay her tribute. And we also convey our condolences to her family and friends. In the field of battle that ultimately took her life, she was sister to us all.

Conservative view on same-sex marriages

In response to your recent articles on same-sex marriages, it is important that the Jewish community understand the official position of the Conservative Rabbinate ("Why I don't officiate at same-sex marriages," CJN, June 12; "Rabbis split over legalization of same-sex marriages," CJN, June 19).

As part of a consensus statement on homosexuality decided on March 25, 1992, the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards of the Rabbinical Assembly ruled the following: "We will not perform commitment ceremonies for gays or lesbians."

Disagrees with Rabbi Novak

I have never once questioned Rabbi Novak's right to be married, nor have I lost a moment's sleep sitting in judgment on the union of any two people ("Rabbis split over legalization of same-sex marriages," CJN, June 19). I understand the rabbi's halachic stance on the matter, which is that same-sex marriages render the traditional institution of marriage meaningless, although there are several responsa contrary to his opinion that are credible. In a purely civil sense, however, Rabbi Novak has absolutely no business wading into what is essentially a private matter between two people and the state. His blessing isn't sought. I find his words offensive.

My partner and I have a proud Jewish family. Both of our children attend Jewish day schools. We will celebrate our 18th anniversary next year. We married civilly two days ago and next year we will have a religious wedding. If people focused on our commitment to family, Jewishness and community, they might – just might – get their minds out of the gutter and stop focusing on physical aspects of difference.

Letter writer criticized

Adina Scheim's letter, "Re: Send Queen's Park a message," in the June 19 issue of The CJN, while well meaning, is quite naive and full of misconceptions. Several issues she raises need to be addressed.

First, she seems to question whether tax relief for Jewish day schools should be a matter of concern for the Jewish community. The answer to this is an emphatic yes. While it is true that not all Jewish students go to day schools, it is an uncontested fact that Jewish day school education is the surest way of ensuring Jewish continuity, survival and strength for future generations of our people. Jewish education has ensured the existence of our people from time immemorial, and it will continue to do so into the future. As such, the entire Jewish community should be interested in the viability of our day schools, and the well-being of the students' parents.

Secondly, Scheim says some families cannot make use of these tax credits because they cannot afford day school education. Our community is fortunate in that tuition fees are subsidized for those who cannot afford them. It is true that day school parents need to make sacrifices, but nobody is turned away for lack of means. In fact, many students at our community's schools come from very modest middle class or even lower class families. It is precisely those people for whom the Equity in Education Tax Credit offers the greatest relief.

Thirdly, Scheim mentions that a just solution to differences in funding between Jewish and Catholic schools would be to stop funding Catholic schools. Aside from the massive social turmoil that that would cause in our province, a fair and just society should provide for choices in education. Some parents will choose the secular oriented public school system. We all believe that strong, well-funded public education is a cornerstone of our society. However, many others prefer a religiously based alternative to the secular public schools, and a fair and just society should provide for that option.

Finally, Scheim says there should be no public funding for religion. The funding of a denominational school, be it Catholic, Jewish or anything else, accounts for the fact that these schools teach the basic curriculum – including reading, writing and arithmetic – that is expected to be mastered by all students of this province. Religion is not being funded per se, but rather the total education of the child in a religious atmosphere.

I would hope that our entire community, whether or not they personally have made the choice of day school education for their children, recognize the importance of this issue. I hope they jump on the bandwagon and support the concept of provincial funding of our fine day schools.

Road map a glimmer of hope

While I am no fan of Ariel Sharon, I am very happy that Bert Raphael is not Israel's prime minister ("Israel must remove Hamas," Letters to the Editor, CJN, June 26). At the very moment that Hamas has finally agreed (albeit temporarily) to a halt in suicide bombings and Israel has agreed to return security responsibility in Gaza to the Palestinian Authority, Raphael suggests that Israel was too quick to accept the road map and should send in its army to destroy the Hamas organization and arrest its leaders and bombers. Can you imagine what this would do to current efforts to bring the parties to the negotiating table?

We all know that the "road map" is full of potholes and detours and twists and turns, but at the moment, it appears to offer a glimmer of hope that some form of peace agreement can be achieved. So my advice to Raphael and his associates is to cool it, leave the guns in their holsters and allow, in the words of an old metaphor, the parties to "jaw, jaw, jaw" rather than kill, kill, kill.

Islamism: anti-Semitism and the cult of death

By MANUEL PRUTSCHI

It has been our misfortune as Jews that Christianity and Islam grew out of Judaism. No sooner were they born than they took up an antagonistic position towards the parent religion and its followers. In one of history's tragic ironies, neither of the two new faiths practised the biblical injunction of honouring your father and your mother.

Christianity painted the Jews as an impure and contemptible people who were the agents of Satan. Alien and evil, they were responsible for all the ills of humankind and intent on destroying the true faith.

Islam viewed the Jews as "God's and humanity's unchosen" in the words of Israeli historian Benny Morris, in a recent New Republic book review.

Robert Wistrich, in turn, in Muslim Anti-semitism: A Clear and Present Danger, notes that Islamic tradition depicted the Jew as "malevolent[ly], conspiratorial[ly] fomenting sectarian strife… heresies and deviations that undermined or endangered the unity of the umma [the Muslim nation]."

We can now understand better why many Muslims have been so receptive to Europe's historic anti-Semitic themes and how it is that they have been able to integrate them so easily with their own enduring anti-Semitic tradition.

The themes include the poisoning of wells, the blood libel, the Shylock myth, Holocaust denial, and most especially, The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, purporting to be the Jewish blueprint for world domination. This calumny is available for purchase in Islamic bookshops throughout the world.

The Protocols was an anti-Semitic forgery of the early 1900s, produced by the secret police of Czarist Russia, which would soon be supplanted by the Soviet Union, the 20th century's first totalitarian entity. The Nazis found the document made to order for them.

Islamists – the adherents of Islamism – are the most recent ones to adopt The Protocols. This should not surprise us, when we realize that Islamism is a sweeping, modern, totalitarian religio-political movement very much akin to German Nazism or Russian communism.

Bernard Lewis in The Crisis of Islam: Holy War and Unholy Terror importantly cautions us not to confuse Islamism with Islam the religion. The confusion arises, he explains, because unlike Christianity and Christendom, the single word "Islam" denotes both a religion and a civilization.

Islamism thus emerges out of Islam the civilization but is no more reflective of spiritual Islam (as opposed to political) than Hitlerism and Stalinism are of Christianity, even though both arose within Christendom.

The comparison with Nazism and communism is not merely superficial. All three are the enemies of pluralist democracy, are anti-Semitic, are revolutionary in their intent on creating global utopian societies in their own images and are not prepared to let mere mortals stand in their way.

Christopher Hitchens' catchword, "Islamofascism" should therefore not be taken as an epithet but as an accurate description.

There are three branches to Islamism: Saudi Arabia's Wahhabism, Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood and its offshoots and Iran's Khomeinism. Khomeinism is the most recent. Wahhabism is the oldest.

Saudi Arabia's Wahhabism arose in the 18th century in the desert of Arabia. It was the result of a merger of two families, those of the tribal chieftain Muhammad ibn Saud (after whom the state is named) and the preacher Muhammad ibn Abdul al-Wahhab (after whom the denomination is named).

Stephen Schwartz in The Two Faces of Islam: The House of Saud from Tradition to Terror, argues that Saudi Arabian Wahhabism is in fact the first example of modern totalitarianism, which he defines as "the merging of an extremist ideology with an absolute state [whose] true aim… [is] conquest and world domination."

To achieve Islamist utopia one must do three things: return to the pristine faith as practised by the prophet Mohammed, his family and his disciples; re-institute the caliphate, when the Muslim world stretched from Indonesia to Morocco; and Islamize all of humanity. True to totalitarianism, what is required is a revolutionary vanguard to whom everything is permissible.

The Palestinian Abdullah Azzam, one of Islamism's major ideologists, poetically justified the means to this end. Born in Jenin in 1941 and killed by a car bomb in Pakistan in 1989, he was a supporter of Hamas and profoundly influenced Osama bin Laden. Malise Ruthven in A Fury for God: The Islamist Attack on America, quotes Azzam as follows:

"The map of Islamic history becomes coloured with two lines: one of them black, with the ink of the scholar's pen; the other one red with the martyr's blood… History does not write its lines except with blood. Glory does not build its lofty edifice except with skulls. Honour and respect cannot be established except on a foundation of cripples and corpses."

The progression of totalitarian revolution from utopianism to the "cult of death" can best be tracked from the general to the particular through excerpts from Paul Berman's Terrorism and Liberalism:

"The rebellion that begins with freedom and ends with crime… that is indistinguishable from murder and suicide… that makes perfect sense at the start, and quickly produces deaths that make no sense at all…

"The successes of the Islamist revolution were not going to take place on the plane of the living… [They] were going to take place on the plane of the dead, or nowhere… For cruelty was love… and mass death was brotherhood."

Contrast this with the Jewish faith, which according to a Jerusalem Post piece by Paul Johnson, the noted gentile interpreter of Judaism, "was the first religion to preach the sanctity [of human life] and to magnify the value of each individual human being in the eyes of his Creator – hence, equally, in [that of] other human beings."

It is this Jewish sanctification of life, the very antithesis of the cult of death, that is an essential element in understanding the anti-Semitism of Islamism. After the suicide bombing at the Park Hotel in Netanya two Passovers ago, Ismail Haniya, a senior Hamas official in the Gaza strip, demonstrated how attuned Islamists were to the Jewish mentality.

Speaking to Lee Hockstader of the Washington Post, he said: "Anyone reading an Israeli newspaper can see their suffering. [Jews] love life more than any other people, and they prefer not to die."

Haniya could have added that Islamists, on the other hand, prefer death to life. Suicide terrorism, more than a means to an end, is an end in itself, two ends in fact: martyrdom and murder.

The Egyptian Sayyid Qutb was the primary architect of Islamism's entire intellectual edifice. Among his most influential works are Signposts on the Road, a kind of Islamist manifesto and In the Shade of the Qu'ran, a 30-volume commentary on the holy text. Gamal Abdel Nasser, Egypt's secular ruler, had Qutb executed in 1966. Qutb's brother, Muhammad, taught bin Laden Islamic studies in Saudi Arabia.

The Jewish love of life and the will to live grated on Qutb, as it did on all the Islamists. "The Qu'ran," he comments, "points to another contemptible characteristic of the Jews; their craven desire to live, no matter at what price and regardless of quality, honour and dignity."

Can you not almost visualize the clenched fists of utter irritation and anger?

This visceral, historic and unredeemable anti-Semitism of Islamism is as much responsible for the assault on Israel as it is for the assault on Diaspora Jewry.

Palestinian leaders and preachers, Morris writes, "guided by history and religion, have traditionally seen the Jews as an inferior race whose proper place was as an abased minority in a Muslim polity; and the present situation, with an Arab minority under Jewish rule, is regarded as a perversion of nature and divine will."

He adds that the Islamists see the "continuous defeats… Israel has… inflicted on the Arab world… as a basic violation or disruption of the 'cosmic order,' something humiliating and unfathomable."

The issue with Israel, although it superficially might appear to be about occupation and Palestinian nationalism, is in fact part of Islamism's overall totalitarianism.

Ruthven quotes Azzam regarding the lands Islam has lost since the caliphate. "Jihad is now… incumbent on all Muslims," Azzam exhorts, "and will remain so until the Muslims recapture every spot that was Islamic but later fell into the hands of the infidels. Jihad has been an individual obligation since the fall of al-Andalus [i.e. Spanish Granada in 1492], and will remain so until all other lands that were Muslim are returned to us… [Afghanistan], Palestine, Burma, Lebanon, Chad, Eritrea, Somalia, the Philippines, Southern Yemen, Tashkent and al-Andalus."

This list is hardly exhaustive. Ruthven concludes that "the attachment to the lost lands of Palestine… [unlike a rational and humane concern for Palestinian rights] is, like Mussolini's evocations of ancient Rome, nostalgic in its irredentism, its 'obliteration of history from politics.'"

Anti-Semitism as well as anti-Americanism in particular and anti-Occidentalism in general, are inherent to Islamism. Its attacks on Israel and the United States are existential. There can therefore be no constructive dialogues with Islamofascists and jihadists. These must be relentlessly fought.

What is encouraging, however, is the outlook of Noah Feldman, a young Orthodox Jewish scholar of Islam, author of the recently published After Jihad: America and the Struggle for Islamic Democracy. Islam and democracy, he argues, are very much compatible.

The opportunity, as a result, is there for fostering good relations between Jews and the many Muslims Feldman identifies as rejecting religious violence and favouring pluralist democratic politics. We can advance this goal by reading our sacred texts judiciously and with the right emphasis as well as by mutually recognizing and respecting our pasts.

We should not despair about the future. There is much that Islam and Judaism have in common and the prospects for Islamic democracy are very real.

Moving day

July 1 is traditionally moving day in Montreal. Aside from the absurdity of encouraging everyone to move on the same day, the notion of moving itself requires reflection. The physical dislocation compounded by emotional upheaval characterizes this human venture.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Personally, I hate moving. I have not moved since 1976. Last month, I moved offices. Although I only had to move from the third floor to an office on the first floor, I was not a happy camper. What an experience! I cannot imagine the turmoil caused by moving to another building.

In the process of packing, unpacking, throwing things out and re-placing favourite objects, I tried to make sense of my feelings. Certainly, I did not like this move since it signified a job shift. It also meant transferring from a spacious location to smaller, more intense quarters. But the principal reason for my emotional reaction was the imbalance produced by this relatively trivial change.

Given that perspective, I had to ask myself: How did my grandmother do it?

How do immigrants do it? How does someone pick up and leave all that is familiar? (I was out of sorts because my pictures were no longer in the old familiar places!) Thousands of people migrate every year, either because they've been forced out of their homes or because they are seeking better living conditions. In either case, they experience traumatic dislocations. Even if the move signifies an improvement, it nevertheless requires a leap of faith into the unknown: new languages, neighbours, foods, customs, climate, styles, laws – so much to learn, so easy to fail. Just thinking about it unnerves me.

I often think of the boat trips my grandparents made from Hungary and Poland. Their stories only gave glimpses of these passages. Not knowing where their next meal was going to come from, these immigrants managed to recreate a network of relatives and friends, adjust to a modern lifestyle and establish vital Jewish lives. Reading history books and memoirs helps, but it is still difficult to picture the extent of the hardships and consequent accomplishments. They suffered the fear of the unknown, the emotional toll of abandoning loved ones, demanding adjustments and especially loneliness. How courageous they were. All of them. Whether they moved by choice or not, their goal of survival created a future for us.

I suppose these thoughts ought to minimize my present discomfort. They certainly compel me to feel awe and sympathy for immigrants. The biblical admonition to be kind to all strangers for we were strangers in Egypt resonates. But instead of reducing my emotional turmoil, these immigrant experiences magnify my appreciation for stability and my distress at relocation. Given these ruminations, you can imagine the grumbling when I eventually move out of my house.

It's all done by numbers

In synagogue we have been reading from the book of Numbers – in Hebrew, Bamidbar. The English name is based on the opening section, where Moses is commanded to take a census of the fighting men of Israel. The Hebrew name comes from the book's first words, as the tribes are now deep in the midbar, the wilderness, and if all goes well – which of course it does not – are preparing to fight their way into Canaan.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Both names are fraught with deeper meaning. The wilderness is a place of both contemplation and revelation, and of danger and confusion. Numbering the Israelites via a census, when God commands it, is a good thing, indicating the nation's readiness to fight for its rights. On the other hand, when King David orders a census centuries later, he is punished severely. Clearly, counting the nation was something done only at divine behest!

Despite this, UIA Federations Canada is analyzing the Jewish population of Canada based on Statistics Canada's 2001 census. Our community will benefit from this information. It gives Canadian Jewry a window into the economic, social, religious, employment, poverty, household and gender characteristics of our community. So far, no thunderbolt has struck, and we assume that this census has a benign purpose.

Over the next year and a half, reports based on census figures will reveal much about the lives of Canadian Jews. Studies will look at household characteristics (how many kids we have, how we earn our living), where we live (Vancouver is still number 3), the persistence and effects of poverty in our community, where we come from, the internal and external migration of our population, differences in the earning power of men and women, the educational level of Canadian Jews and much, much more.

What I want to comment on is how we determine who is a Jew for purposes of this undertaking. It provides us with a fascinating look, not into census techniques, but into the minds and hearts of Canadian Jewry.

Here is how it works. One in five respondents receives the "long form," which asks a detailed set of questions about their lives. If readers have received such a form, they will know that the form contains two crucial questions. One asks the respondent to indicate their religion – including Judaism – or indicate they have "no religion"; only one answer can be chosen. A second question asks for ethnic origin, and here one may give multiple answers: for instance, Russian, Jewish and Canadian. Anyone who indicated they were Jewish by religion, Jewish by ethnic origin with no religion, or Jewish by religion but with an ethnicity other than Jewish, are counted as Jewish for purposes of the UIA Federation studies. Respondents who indicated they were ethnically Jewish but of another religion are not considered Jewish for purposes of the studies.

Just in case you are completely confused by now – and who wouldn't be – look at it this way.

Fruma Sarah filled out the census and said she was Jewish by ethnicity and by religion. She's in.

Chaim Yankel is a farbrente, proud Marxist Jew. When he filled out the census he indicated he was Jewish by ethnicity but had no religion. He is in our sample.

Yente the Matchmaker answered she was Jewish by religion, but Canadian by ethnicity. She's one of us.

However, Elie Meli answered he was Canadian by ethnicity and, being a confirmed agnostic, indicated no religion. Boris from Russia, afraid to reveal his Jewishness, also did not choose "Jewish" for either question. Alas, neither will be counted in our sample. Nor will Madeleine, who had a Jewish grandfather and indicated Jewish ethnicity, but is a Catholic.

The trick for our demographers is to figure out what motivates these various responses. Vancouver, long considered the secular capital of Jewish Canada, actually had 3,000 more responses to Jewish by religion in 2001 than in 1991. Have we become so frum? I doubt it. Has religion become more comfortable in an age of emphasis on religious identity, regardless of level of observance? Maybe. Are we answering more questions about our ethnicity by saying we are Canadian, rather than Jewish? Again, maybe.

In an essay called, The Realism of Numbers, the Magic of Numbers published in Congregation: Contemporary Writers Read the Jewish Bible, Yale University professor Geoffrey Hartman writes: "The marshalling of the tribes… suggests that the children of Israel are emerging from the status of 'mixed multitude' into something resembling a community."

We will soon know just what kind of a community we are "growing into." Stay tuned.

A few random thoughts for summer vacation

This morning at 6:30, my four-year-old daughter and I chatted about what we might feed the seagulls when we go up to Lake Winnipeg (last year it was a bagel). She giggled as we considered sandwiches and ice cream. We also thought we might make little sunhats for the birds this year. My wife thinks there's a four-year-old trapped in my body. I don't think that's true, but it would explain the extra weight I'm carrying around.

My daughter has been really silly lately – and it's an absolute treat. Part of her silliness revolves around the Hebrew language. We just spent a weekend at Camp Massad, where they speak Hebrew, and she has a pair of sibling friends whose parents are raising them in Hebrew and English. Plus, she's been hanging out with her seven-year-old cousin who knows a lot of Hebrew words.

She's eager to catch up, so she's asked my wife and me to speak Hebrew in the evenings. So, we use the holy language to tell her to brush her teeth, put on her pyjamas, pick up her toys and go to sleep.

She just says "shalom," and then rambles on in gibberish and laughs hysterically. It's cute, but I'm not sure if this is what Eliezer Ben Yehuda quite had in mind.

My niece attends Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the local Jewish high school and my alma mater. I went to the school's awards night this week. Not exactly an exciting affair, but an important experience nonetheless. As they were reading out the students' names and their accomplishments, I was impressed by the value that this school community places on being a good person. They included "menschlichkeit" awards along with achievement in math, science, Judaic studies and athletics. People applauded the mensches. Kids smiled. This was probably a good thing for my wife and I to see as we get ready to make some choices for our kids' future education.

When I was a kid, Canada Day was called Dominion Day and I used to wonder if the people who worked at Loblaws got jealous. As an adult, I wonder why more people don't make a big deal about this country's birthday.

Sometimes it seems as if people only get excited when July 1 falls on a Friday or a Monday so they can have a long weekend. With a Tuesday Canada Day this year, many people were probably angrily muttering the names of the Fathers of Confederation under their breaths, cursing them for their poor planning. Actually, that's not entirely true. Most Canadians couldn't name any of the Fathers of Confederation (but they could recite the entire home roster from the 1972 Canada-Russia hockey series, or the cast of King of Kensington).

As Jews, we should not be indifferent about Canada Day. We live in a glorious, tolerant democracy. We are free to practise our faith. We are free to produce community newspapers. We are free to worship. We are free to be. While it's true that there are some dark spots on Canada's history, and while our community as a whole might not agree with all policies of the federal and provincial governments, we have the right to lobby, vote, challenge and run for office.

Ideally, the depth of gratitude we should feel should not be diminished by how long ago our families moved here. We've all seen recent immigrants on television being sworn in as new Canadians. The gratitude and excitement they feel is heartwarming.

As a third-generation Canadian, it's hard to experience the type of gratitude that newcomers feel. But the least I can do – the least any of us can do – is pause and reflect on Canada Day about how lucky we are to live here. My family and I waved the maple leaf on Canada Day and thank those Fathers of Confederation, whose names escape me at the moment.

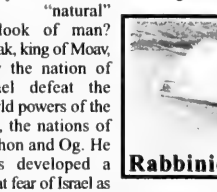
Our nation's identity is shaped by morality

By RABBI RONALD WEISS



What does the Torah expect of a spiritual person and how does this compare with what some might call the "natural" outlook of man? Balak, king of Moav, saw the nation of Israel defeat the world powers of the day, the nations of Sichon and Og. He thus developed a great fear of Israel as well as a hatred and jealousy toward the Israelites, which led to a desire to curse and murder them.

But Balak should have known that Israel would not harm him. The reason was simple: they had been commanded by God not to interfere with his nation. Nonetheless, Balak saw Israel's victory over Sichon and Og and he worried. Why? Balak was a warrior king, a ruler whose power was dependent upon his military strength. He lived in a world where fighting was the norm. He interacted with other warrior kings in a society that was essentially devoid of what we understand to be moral values. From his perspective, a mighty nation simply ran from one victory to the next and would not stop unless beaten back. No nation emerging from a successful campaign against the great and powerful Sichon and Og would lay down its weapons when facing Moav. Balak was afraid because he could not comprehend the idea of a nation that would refuse to wage war merely because they had been told to stop. Even the idea that this had been a command directly from the Almighty did not carry very much weight with him. He retained his fear and sought to curse the people of Israel so that he might defeat them.

Another example of such a difference in outlook can be seen in a Midrash quoted by Rashi on the verse, "Bilaam arose early in the morning and saddled his donkey" (22:21). The Midrash says that God spoke to Bilaam: "Wicked one! Their forefather Avraham preceded you, as it says: 'And Avraham arose early in the morning and saddled his donkey' (Bereshit 22:3)." This points to the enormous moral contrast between Avraham and Bilaam. Bilaam rose early in order to run after wealth and glory, using his donkey to help him realize his desires. He was committed to destroying his imagined enemies and to building on the downfalls of others.

Avraham, on the other hand, rose early in order to sacrifice what he held most dear, his son Yitzchak. For those familiar with Hebrew language, the word for "saddled" – yachvosh – is closely related to the verb "to conquer" – kovesh. The word for "donkey" used in Bereshit regarding Avraham is chamor, which is related to the word for "physical," chomer. Avraham arose and conquered his desires in service of God – conquering those same desires that Bilaam tried to satisfy.

The Jewish nation described in the Bible does not desire to rule the world or to take what is not theirs. Moral and ethical values have been part of the Jewish spiritual consciousness throughout our entire history. However, a religious and spiritual identity shaped by morality does not mean our rights and religious values should be denigrated. Even today we have, unfortunately, learned again of the need to defend ourselves when attacked and fight to protect what is ours. Those who look only at the cases where God commanded conquest and accuse Israel of being a warrior nation ignore the many cases where God ordered Israel to live in peace and not attack another nation – even though it was clearly within their power to do so. Certainly, we are mindful of the teaching of our Sages – Haba l'harg'cha hashkaim l'hargo – when one comes to kill you, rise up and kill him (first)" (Rashi on Shemot 22.1).

The Torah says our ultimate goals must not be material wealth, glory or honour – and certainly not ill-gotten gain. We are asked to put aside our own desires in order to pursue our spiritual destiny. But this does not mean we are to abandon our spiritual heritage because other nations are not happy with us. We must continue to live by the religious and spiritual values given to us by the Almighty. By so doing, we will maintain our self respect and our identity, not to mention ultimately the respect of other nations. We can expect no less from ourselves.

Shabbat Shalom.

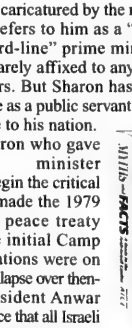
The 'warrior' does want peace

MYTH:

Ariel Sharon has made clear that he does not want peace and no deal is possible as long as he is prime minister.

FACT:

Ariel Sharon has been demonized by the Arabs and caricatured by the media, which often refers to him as a "right-wing" or "hard-line" prime minister, appellations rarely affixed to any other foreign leaders. But Sharon has spent most of his life as a public servant trying to bring peace to his nation.



It was Sharon who gave then-prime minister Menachem Begin the critical backing that made the 1979 Israel-Egypt peace treaty possible. The initial Camp David negotiations were on the verge of collapse over then-Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's insistence that all Israeli settlements in the Sinai be dismantled when Begin called Sharon and asked if he should give up the settlements. Sharon not only advised him to do so, but ultimately was the one who implemented the decision to remove the settlers, some by force (Steven Spiegel, The Other Arab-Israeli Conflict: Making America's Middle East Policy from Truman to Reagan; Ariel Sharon, Warrior).

Sharon's views have also evolved over time. While he was once fiercely opposed to the creation of a Palestinian state, as prime minister, he has endorsed the idea, in opposition to members of his own party. Since taking office, Sharon has repeatedly offered to negotiate with the Palestinians on condition only that they end the violence. He asked for only seven days of peace – a demand that some criticized despite the fact that the Palestinians had promised at Oslo eight years of peace – and later, he even dropped that demand. When he did, the Palestinians responded with a suicide bombing that killed 29 people at a Passover seder in a Netanya hotel.

Sharon subsequently proposed a peace conference, an idea the Bush administration endorsed. Even when Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah proposed a peace initiative that was filled with provisions the Saudis knew Israel could never accept, such as the condition to return to Israel's 1967 borders, Sharon did not reject the plan, and called for direct negotiations to discuss it. Now, Sharon has agreed to negotiate with the Palestinians according to the road map formula devised by the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, despite serious reservations about many elements of the plan.

If the Arabs doubt Sharon's commitment to peace, all they need do is put him to the test – end the violence. So long as the Palestinians keep up their terrorist attacks, no Israeli prime minister can offer them concessions.

"To keep 3.5 million people under occupation is bad for us and them… I want to say clearly that I have come to the conclusion that we have to reach a [peace] agreement." — Ariel Sharon (Associated Press, May 26).

Nothing sacred in this book

Nothing Sacred: The Truth About Judaism*, by Douglas Rushkoff, Random House, 2003, $37.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This is a misguided and often infuriating book with a chutzpahdik subtitle – especially from one whose Jewish background is limited.

The author, an Internet maven who has written several books on the subject, now offers his "working proposal for Judaism's next great renaissance."

He writes that although Judaism "finds its roots in some of the most progressive ideas conceived in history, Judaism today is nonetheless associated with superstition, racism, sexism and a haughty refusal to clean up its own act."

Rabbis and congregations, he asserts, should stop worrying about dwindling numbers or about intermarriage or assimilation. What must be stressed is Judaism as a champion of iconoclasm, abstract monotheism and universal social justice. Nowhere in the book, however, are we actually told what icons or sacred cows Judaism should be demolishing.

Rushkoff blithely insists Judaism is not a set of beliefs, but a process that must undergo constant revision and renewal. So-called lapsed Jews who are seeking spiritual meaning must be welcomed into the community even if they are unconcerned with traditional observance or adherence to the synagogue. And if all of this leads to the dilution of religion, so much the better – that's part of Judaism's iconoclastic mission. The idea of Jews as a chosen people is pernicious and hinders the spread of the faith among the enlightened. Zionism is a problem because it restricts Judaism to a "patch of sacred soil rather than a claim to the entire planet as a kind of Jerusalem."

The author stresses the need to interpret the Hebrew Scriptures, making full use of modern scholarship, and he rails against rabbis who refuse to do so in order to stifle controversy. He is convinced that if we can release the Torah from its obligation to serve as a historical record, we liberate it, and ourselves, to generate an unending bounty of new narratives through which to create new meaning.

Rushkoff says many rabbis and Jewish leaders understand that their tactics are contrary to the spirit of Judaism, but believe that "the pressing need for more bodies and wallets that can be tallied as Jewish outweighs the short-term damage caused by distorting the religion's theological and ethical foundations. But it does force us to ask who, really, is lapsing Judaism."

Where circumcision is concerned, Rushkoff is impressed by a ceremony called bris shalom, which is designed to fulfil "the spiritual and communal obligations for circumcision without the traumatic effects or violation of rights": "Should the day arise when I need to make this choice on behalf of a son, I'm glad that Judaism now offers me more than the stern voice of an intransigent rabbi or the shunning of an entire community," he writes.

The author draws much of his inspiration from Freud, Spinoza, Buber and Maimonides, who is transformed into a New Age rationalist at the expense of his major ideas and philosophy.

It is astonishing that Rushkoff is invited to speak to synagogues and Jewish organizations across North America and that this mishmash has even been praised by rabbis. Have they read it?

Take me out to the ball game
Take me out with the crowd
Buy me some peanuts and Cracker Jack
I don't care if I never get back...

Harry von Tilzer (born Aaron Gumbinsky) will be loved forever for creating the melody to "Take Me Out to the Ball Game" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?I23A34215]. And like many of the game's greats, von Tilzer was Jewish [http://www.city-journal.org/html/10_3_tin_pan_alley_diarist.html].

Rabbi Richard Agler remembers how every year he would announce von Tilzer's yahrzeit with "considerable reverence" when he was at Stephen Wise Free Synagogue in Manhattan. (By the way, the Yiddish lyrics came later, thanks to Henry Sapoznik.)

As Shel Krakofsky pointed out a few years ago in The CJN, one of the greatest baseball players of all time was also the "only player in Major League history to strike out in 12 consecutive plate appearances." Although his lifetime batting average was .097, he was the youngest player ever elected into the Hall of Fame. The player? Sandy Koufax [http://www.cjnews.com/pastissues/98/may7-98/feature/feature2.htm].

Koufax, of course, didn't pitch for his Los Angeles Dodgers in the first game of the 1965 World Series against the Minnesota Twins because it was Yom Kippur. Sandor Slomovits captures the pride felt then by every Jewish baseball-loving fan in his article "Yom Kippur and Sandy Koufax: They'll Always Go Together." Slomovits says Koufax's decision to sit out the game transcended the sport and even had an incredible impact on people who normally had no use for the game, like Slomovits' father. "To my father, baseball was still a stupid game, but all of a sudden, it was not played by only stupid people. Sandy Koufax did not hide his Jewishness. He took a righteous stand. And my father, along with millions of Jews, was proud of him. 'He's a good Jewish boy,' my father said. His highest praise." [http://jewishsports.com/reflections/]

Also on the JewishSports Web site are several great baseball articles, including a look at how Jews made baseball "Our Own," and a review of Aviva Kemper's documentary, The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg.

Here are some special treats! Fans can download Professor Eric Solomon's essay "Jews and Baseball: A Cultural Love Story" in which he argues that the game has played a crucial role in the evolution of Jewish society [http://ls.berkeley.edu/dept/townsend/pubs/OP08_Sport_and_Race.pdf]. After that, you can read on-line, the entire book, Jewish Baseball Stars (New York: Hippocrene Books, 1984) by Harold and Meir Ribalow [http://www.jewsinsports.org/publication.asp?titleID=1]. You can also read profiles of 168 Jewish baseball players, from Cal "Abie" Abrams to Eddie Zosky [http://www.jewsinsports.org/list.asp?sport=baseball]. And lest you believe that the only Jewish players of note are in North America, check out the action in Israel, where Amit Megiddo, Yehuda Beinin and Sholom Menorah play on teams like Shomrot Triple T, Zion Tours and the Dimona Mean Judeans [http://www.eteams.com/israelbaseballsoftball].

The most eye-popping article that I have come across is Reuven Goldfarb's "Baseball Kabbalah." In it, he makes indisputable parallels between the two mystical activities: First, the 10 players (nine plus batter) on the field correspond to the number of Sefirot (divine emanations) that constitute the kabbalistic Tree of Life. About umpires, he writes, "Easy. They're Dayanim (rabbinical judges). That's why they wear dark colors. Managers? Rebbes. Coaches? Gabbais." And of the seventh inning stretch, he says, "Does that sound like Shabbat to you?" [http://www.ascent.org.il/Surprise/Sport/baseball%20kabbalah.html]

One retires, one stays put after 26 years

Helen Senor

Helen Senor says goodbye to Israeli consulate

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Although Helen Senor has worked for the past 26 years as the secretary to Israel's consul generals in Toronto, she has begun a new job seven times.

"Each time a new consul general arrives, it's like starting over," says Senor, who retired at the end of June.

"The job has not changed, but what does change is that each consul general, who represents Israel in Toronto and western Canada, has his own style."

Senor was born in Czechoslovakia and survived the Holocaust with her mother and siblings – her father died in Auschwitz – by hiding and posing as Christian.

She says she and her late husband Jim, who was national director of Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, were ardent Zionists. She has two children and two stepchildren, two of whom live in Israel.

When she replaced her predecessor at the consulate, who held the job for 17 years, Senor wondered how the woman could have stayed in the job for so long.

"I thought I would remain for a few years, and then I would move on.

"I felt like I was doing something worthwhile, though. I became involved in the job emotionally and intellectually. Certainly, my heart was in it."

Part of her job, Senor says, was to assist the consul general in his day-to-day activities and in his outreach to the community.

"Each time pressure builds up in Israel, we feel it here. For 26 years, I felt like I lived in Israel five days a week. I'm surrounded by Israelis and the Hebrew language, and all the concerns are about Israel."

It is important for the consul general to have a Canadian assistant, she says, "because we know the ropes. Due to my husband's involvement, I am familiar with the community

The consulate is a place like no other, Senor says. "People go out of their way to help. A while ago, the police called to tell us that an Israeli tourist had been robbed. We spent hours with him. We phoned his family and arranged for a new passport. When people need us, we are there."

Israelis are an inspiration to her, Senor says. She tries to visit the country at least twice a year and speaks to her children there regularly.

"No matter what happens, [Israelis] go on," she says, noting that while on a recent trip, "an Israeli heard I was from Toronto, and she asked if I was afraid to return home because of SARS.

"Israelis will not give in to their fears. It would be like handing [the Palestinians] a victory."

It feels like a "lifetime ago" that she started her job, Senor says. "My son was in Grade 1, and it was a real juggle managing work and home. I wouldn't have changed anything, however."

Senor says she is looking forward to having some free time and remaining active in her synagogue, Beth Haminyan, a 200-member congregation with no rabbi and no cantor. "It's a special place. We are all involved.

"I'll miss the consulate, however. I've made some warm friendships. When you spend so many days and years with people, they become part of your life."

Will she move to Israel some day? "It's not out of the question, but meanwhile, my life here is full."

Na'amat's Levene remains active at Na'amat Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 26 years as executive director of Na'amat Canada Toronto, Lorraine Levene has no plans to retire.

"I have too many plans and too much to do. As I get older I need less sleep so I'm gaining speed," says Levene, 74, who has four children and five grandchildren.

Shortly after joining the organization, then called Pioneer Women, she took part in a leadership mission to Israel, and it was on that trip that she learned the scope of the organization, she says.

"It was mind boggling. There wasn't a service for children and women that Na'amat did not provide, but there was so much to be done.

"Many of the facilities for children were in dire need of rebuilding, and many more day-care centres were needed. At the high school in Hadera – it specializes in helping underachievers who were not successful in their regular school – students were bundled in hats and gloves because it was February and the building had no heat," she says.

She returned from that trip on a personal mission. "By hook or by crook, I was going to raise the money needed to build more day-care centres and build a real high school in Hadera."

Ten years later the school was completed, "and to my surprise they dedicated the amphitheatre in my name. To this day, that school is my pride and joy."

Israeli settlers hope to counter stereotypes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As far as talk show callers go, Heather has got to be one of the more extreme.

The first to phone in to a recent airing of the Bill Carroll Show on CFRB radio, Heather quickly launched into a lengthy tirade that employed classic anti-Semitic stereotypes and accused Israel and Israeli settlers of pretty much everything under the sun, including territorial designs on Kuwait.

Yet Heather's heated oration did not surprise three visiting Israelis, spokesmen for the settler movement in the northern West Bank region of Shomron, who were guests on the call-in show.

Forced to dodge rocks thrown at their car windshields and see their children off every morning in bullet-proof school buses, the verbal assault did not faze them.

The three, Natan Kandler, Benzy Lieberman and Pinchas Gerber, were in Toronto recently for a two-day visit that included the radio appearance, meetings with political figures and visits with supporters in the Jewish and pro-Zionist Christian communities.

While Heather may represent the extreme anti-Semitic element in Toronto, they have heard her kind of views before, they said. When given the opportunity to appear on radio shows, they try to counter the kind of stereotypes of settlers she expounded.

"We understand the need for PR that will clearly and eloquently express the needs of the people in our area, [and we need] to unite with Jews and Christians in order to lobby with us...to maintain our historical ties to the land of Israel," said Gerber, deputy director of social services and director of the Shomron Development Fund.

Despite the Heathers of the world, the settler spokesmen say they have cultivated a substantial level of support among other Canadians.

"We came here because the amount of support we've been able to generate is phenomenal, to the point where people begin to understand the importance Shomron has for the security of the State of Israel," said Gerber.

Canadians "understand the unique circumstances we're living in and they want to help us politically, financially and emotionally," said Gerber, who laid the groundwork for the recent trip with a visit to Toronto a few months ago.

The settler movement, Gerber explained, is reaching out to supporters around the world to aid in providing financial support for basic social and welfare services.

In addition, "people are very much interested in hearing our point of view. They understand we have a lot to offer regarding their understanding of the geopolitical realities in that part of the world."

Kandler, who served in a variety of Jewish educational positions in Toronto from 1996-2000, said many Toronto visitors to Israel are eager to nurture inter-communal ties. Altogether, more than 30 projects require funding, he said.

Gerber said many Torontonians have already opened their wallets to support social service projects in the Shomron region, giving money for bullet-proof vehicles, electronic protection fences, mobile dental clinic ($150,000 US), funds to send kids to summer camps and even aid to send stressed-out families on holiday respites.

Lieberman, mayor of the Shomron regional council and chair of the Yesha Council (which includes communities in Shomron, Judea and Gaza), said Shomron residents are merely attempting to live normal lives, contrary to the impression broadcast on TV.

Visitors to the region "see a normal life, Jews who believe this belongs to them. They want normal security and quiet. The Palestinians are the killers, the murderers. They don't want Jewish people in Tel Aviv or Haifa and in Judea or Samaria," he said.

Lieberman, who is no relation to the U.S. senator, said settlers don't have "our voices" heard in North America. "You hear [Shimon] Peres, [Yossi] Beilin, the weak voices from Israel. This is not the mainstream of the street in Israel. The mainstream is the voice we represent. Judea and Samaria (Shomron) is part of the historic Jewish land and we will never, ever leave these places. We acknowledge the right of the Palestinians to live near to us in peace and security, but not in terror."

Lieberman said there is no quick fix to the "complex conflict" with the Palestinians. His solution: limited autonomy in which "security belongs to Israel and the civilian life is controlled by themselves."

Although he acknowledged the Palestinians would reject that position, Lieberman said "if Israel is determined, and the Palestinians know it, the Palestinians will accept the situation."

He believes Prime Minster Ariel Sharon agreed to the "roadmap" because he wanted to exhaust all avenues suggested by President George W. Bush, but he fully expects it cannot succeed.

"In the meantime, we're in the frontline and suffering this confusion," Kandler said.

Special to The CJN

Ted and Heidi Winick have good reason to kvell.

Their son Jordan will represent Canada at the international chemistry Olympiad in Greece this month.

But don't expect Jordan Winick to toot his own horn. The tall lanky student is so unassuming that you would never guess he is one of the top chemistry students in the country.

The Northern Secondary School Grade 12 graduate is in Greece with three other Canadian students this month for the international chemistry competition. The Canadian team will be among 260 participants under 20 representing 65 countries.

It took some time for the news to sink in when he learned he would be going to the Olympiad, Winick said in a recent interview.

"For almost a week after, I kept thinking, 'I can't believe that happened.' It was like I had to pinch myself. It's one thing to come first in school for physics or math in nationwide tests, but it's another thing to represent your country internationally."

Over the years, Winick has participated in science and math contests because he loves the challenge, he said. "I really enjoy learning."

The road to the chemistry Olympiad began with some monthly problem sets distributed by the University of Toronto through teachers to the top high school science students. Winick worked on a monthly selection of five problem sets during the fall and early winter. In March, he received an online take-home exam with research questions.

He was subsequently invited to participate in the weekend Ontario chemistry finals held at U of T at the beginning of May. Five of the 20 participants qualified for the Canadian finals at Kingston in mid-May.

Winick was among a group of 18 students from across Canada who spent an intense week at a Kingston military college studying and doing labs.

They wrote exams throughout the week and finals on the sixth day. The selection of the Olympiad participants was based on the results of all the work.

Winick said he was surprised by the results. "I didn't feel from seeing the other kids around me that I was more advanced. I didn't really feel I was in the top four."

He said he thinks his ability to do the labs quickly raised his ranking.

The Olympiad caps off an impressive year for Winick. The 18-year old has a lot of brawn as well. He's been rowing since Grade 9 and is a top sculler in the lightweight category for his age group.

His rowing ability caught the attention of several big-name American universities, and in August, he will be going to study engineering at Yale University with a full academic scholarship.

The schools recruited him because they said it was rare to find an athlete who also excels academically, Winick said after a little prodding.

He had perfect scores in both the English and math components of his SAT scores, the mandatory entrance exam for admission to American universities.

During the spring and fall, Winick would row at 6 a.m. every morning for 1¼ hours at Hanlan Boat Club located east of Cherry Beach. He then would cycle 10 kilometres back to his school in the Eglinton and Mount Pleasant area.

"I like being out on the water in the early morning," he says. "There's no time to waste. It gets your day going great."

When asked if he's considering participating in another Olympiad – the ultimate international sports competition, Winick expressed uncertainty about how his athletic future will unfold. "I'm going to train hard at Yale to see how far I can get.

"I definitely think about the Olympics. It's a huge commitment. That's all you do for four years of your life. I don't know what other goals will come into play. The Olympics are one of those things you dream about."

Levene still going strong at Na'amat

Fundraising has changed since those days, she says. "Then, we raised a lot of money from businesses, but most are no longer in operation and many of the seniors who helped fundraise have died. We had to find new ways to raise money."

Today, she says, more people tend to earmark their money for local charities. "They don't have the feeling of 'next year in Jerusalem.' They still do tzedakah, but their values are different. They want to see where their money is going.

"This challenge is making me even more passionate about my work; there's always something to do. It's hard for me to keep track of all our projects," she says.

Their newest campaign, Tree of Love, is aimed at raising funds in Canada to support all children in Israel. Funds will be raised by selling specially designed leaves which will be sold in stores, schools, corporations and community facilities, and then posted.

As well, schools throughout Canada will receive envelopes containing an information package and a white leaf. These leaves, for children, are blank, so that they can make a picture or write a letter to a child in Israel on the leaf.

"We want public school children in Canada, no matter what their race or religion, to learn about Israel. It should be part of their curriculum. People do not understand Israel, and anti-Semitism is built because of ignorance."

Levene, who has visited Israel almost 20 times, is also involved with Habonim Dror youth organization, Camp Gesher and Bialik Hebrew Day School, all part of the labour Zionist movement.

"I kvell when I see children learning Zionist values at camp or school. Put me near a child and I melt," she says.

She knows she is one of the lucky people, she says. "How many people can be a volunteer and professional in the same chair?"

Number of programs available to study in Israel

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Cary Meister had just begun studying at a yeshiva in a small West Bank town when the second intifadah broke out.

As violence erupted close by, Meister, 20, embarked on a very meaningful, yearlong experience, he said.

"Although people were scared, I felt unity with the Jewish people," he said. "You experience it more intensely that way."

But in order for Meister to spend that time in Israel, he needed help.

"Unfortunately, it's very expensive without financial support," he said.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, the spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto, said in an interview the cost of studying in Israel can be as high as $15,000 a year.

However, he said, a number of scholarships are available through synagogues, universities and community organizations.

"Community missions and tourism are tough to sell, but the kids are going," said Rabbi Tradburks.

Meister, who is a member of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, was the winner of the Gladys Buckler Prize, which the synagogue offers to three or four students between the ages of 18 and 24 each year.

Rabbi Tradburks said in order for students to be eligible for the prize, they must express an interest in studying at a specific institution in Israel, whether it be a yeshiva or a university. The prize, which comes from the congregation's donations subsidizes, but does not fully cover the cost of tuition.

Many of the prizewinners eventually make aliyah, Rabbi Tradburks said.

The students go to "experience a deeper, more integrated Jewish experience than in Canada."

Meister, who will be going into his second year at Yeshiva University in New York City this fall, was on a National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) trip for high school students when he decided to study in Israel.

> 'Parents who appreciate the impact of living in Israel swallow their worry'

He said his first few weeks in the West Bank were "very overwhelming... it was nothing like anything I had experienced before.

"What I have gained has always stuck with me. I have a connection that won't disappear."

Although many parents worry about their children's safety, Rabbi Tradburks said they understand the religious importance of studying there.

"The parents who appreciate the impact of living in Israel swallow their worry," he said. "They say, 'This is what my kid has to do, so I'll just live with it.'"

Study programs are also offered through York University's Jewish education program.

Carla Giryitz, a York University student, sent The CJN an e-mail from Hebrew University in Jerusalem, where she will be studying until July.

"I think it's obvious why Israel is meaningful. Learning Jewish studies in Jerusalem is like nothing else in the world," she wrote. "Given the political situation, this year has been incredibly intense and special. Everyone who is here wants to be here and wants to show their support by physically being here when so many Jews are reluctant to come. I'm sad that I have to leave."

If a particular university doesn't offer scholarships, students can contact Israeli universities directly to find out about their programs and awards. Hebrew University (www.huji.ac.il), Tel Aviv University (www.tau.ac.il) and Bar-Ilan University (www.biu.ac.il) all have different programs featured on their Web sites.

The UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Web site (www.feduja.org) also has a comprehensive list of different scholarships.

Aside from basic programs, the site includes specialized programs in the fine arts, social work, Holocaust studies and women's issues.

Richard Stoll, the federation's senior education consultant, said the organization offers three different scholarships.

The Morris M. Pulver Scholarship Fund for Israel is given to students wishing to study at any institution of higher education. The Israel Scholarship helps send students specifically to yeshivot. The Meyer W. Gasner-Joe Berman Scholarship Fund gives preference to students who intend to study Jewish education in Israel.

These scholarships, which can range from $500 to $2,500, are given on the basis of need, not of merit, Stoll said.

While they do not cover the tens of thousands of dollars it may take to study in Israel, he said, "at least if we can get them on a plane, that's a start."

CORRECTION

In the article "UJA Federation commits $1 M for campus advocacy" (CJN, June 26), it was reported that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto allocated $1 million for 2003-2004 to fund Israel advocacy initiatives at Canadian universities. The money was actually allocated by the Israel Emergency Cabinet, under the auspices of UIA Federations Canada. UJA Federation's campus-related allocations also total approximately $1 million: $838,000 for Hillel of Greater Toronto (an increase of $278,000) and $181,000 for national campus agencies. Between the Israel Emergency Cabinet and UJA Federation, the campus advocacy budget totals $2 million. The CJN regrets the error.

CONDOMINIUMS

"There's just nothing else on the market that combines those three factors," says Jay Brown, General Manager of the Brown Group of Companies, co-developer of the project. "Viva meets a real need in the Bathurst and Wilson area. Thousands of families have found it a great place to live. Our goal is to continue that sense of community."

Viva will eventually be a trio of mid-rise buildings, bringing new life and a touch of urban elegance to the west side of Bathurst Street between Charleswood Drive and Allingham Gardens, about a block north of Wilson Avenue. Currently the site is occupied by a string of post-war eightplexes, fast nearing the end of their useful life. The Brown Group and its partner The Remington Group Inc. long pondered their future.

Both companies have roots in the community dating back to the late 1940s and early 1950s. Their goal with Viva was to revitalize the neighborhood with a new landmark condominium project.

"What we wanted to do was create continuity within the community," explains Richard Tripodi, vice-president of the Remington Group's highrise division. "We wanted to preserve the rental option while adding affordable condos. That would allow first-time buyers to stay in an area they love and empty nesters to downsize in the heart of a community which has been their home for decades."

The result is Viva, a trio of glass and pre-cast concrete mid-rises, which catch the imagination, strung like urban jewels along an 800-foot stretch of Bathurst Street. A separate six-storey building will contain 82 rental units while a pair of eight-storey structures will offer a total of 219 condominium homes. The condo buildings will be joined by a single level promenade, which will serve as the entrance to both buildings and home to Viva's health club.

For singles, young couples just starting their life together or empty nesters looking to downsize in space, not style, the Viva Condominiums offer a range of options certain to suit their needs. One-bedroom units, for example, start at 530 square feet, priced at $159,900. Those needing two bedrooms can find units, which start at 785 square feet and a price of $207,900. Crowning both buildings are a total of 14 penthouses. They offer three bedrooms and 1,225 square feet of living space at a reasonable $338,900. For those looking for a larger home with all the benefits of condominium living, Viva introduces a brand new 1,350 square foot design.

All prices include a parking spot in the underground garage and a storage locker. The suites also feature either a balcony or terrace. The interiors are exactly what you would expect from a Remington project, a company whose Remington, State Park and Broadway homes divisions have long set the standards for single family homes in the Greater Toronto Area

Each suite includes extras like five free appliances, imported ceramic tiles, custom designed kitchen cabinets and 40-ounce broadloom carpeting. For early buyers there is a limited time offer of one of three opening bonuses: Either laminated hardwood flooring in the living and dining rooms, or a trio of stainless steel appliances or a granite kitchen counter top.

Nor have the partners overlooked the amenities, which will lift life at Viva beyond the ordinary. To start there will be a round-the-clock concierge at the main entrance reception desk, backed by security card entrance. Then there is the health club with an exercise gym, change room, steam room, sauna, media room and billiards room. The party room opens onto an adjacent sun terrace and the project's open-air gardens and landscaped promenade. Pedestrian walkways are trellised, adding a touch of old world charm.

Within a minute's walk are the delights of Upper Bathurst Street. For shoppers there is a Costco, Best Buy, Dominion, Winners and Home Depot almost at your doorstep. If residents are in the mood for Italian, there is Paese restaurant; if in need of a quick bite, there is Bagel World, Moe Pancer's Deli or even Starbucks. Yorkdale Shopping Centre, offering everything from knick-knacks to designer fashions, fast food to flicks at Silver City, is a short drive or bus ride to the west. The Wilson Heights or York Mills subway stations are seconds away by car as is Highway 401.

"Viva is a project we are truly proud of," says Mr. Brown. "It reflects everything our families have learned and believe in."

The families are the Browns and the Brattys. Jay Brown's grandfather Sam started the Brown Group in the early 1950s and his father Mel, a real estate lawyer, joined the family business in the late 1970s. Jay is a third generation developer and builder. The same holds true at Remington. That company was started by Donato Bratty in the years immediately following World War II. Today his sons run the show with their sons following in their footsteps. Rudolph "Rudy" Bratty is chairman and chief executive officer and Jerry Bratty is chief operating officer.

Over the course of the past half century, both families have left an indelible mark on the face of the GTA. The Browns, for example, have focused on management and land development. Today their property management portfolio covers 2,200 residential units and half a million square feet of commercial space. Three years ago they created a memorable loft condo project on Sorauren Avenue. In Miami projects have included twin condo towers on the 9000 block of Collins Avenue and a new condo underway in Hollywood, Fla.. Much of the Brown's activity has been behind the scenes, as the people who take raw land and shape it into new communities, ready for builders to work their magic. The Brown Group, for example, is the managing developer behind Tribute Communities' 2,500-home Inspiration project at Bathurst and Gamble Road in Richmond Hill.

"While we haven't focused on the condo market, this project was such a natural for us, that we had to take the opportunity," says Mr. Brown.

Remington has roots in the GTA real estate market, which run equally deep – if not deeper. The company has five divisions: Industrial and commercial construction, residential construction, land development, property management and finance and administration. Each year it builds about 700 homes through its Remington, State Park and Broadway companies. Remington focuses on starter and move-up homes; State Park creates classically inspired residences aimed at the executive market while Broadway builds unique estate homes.

In one of its most ambitious undertakings to date, Remington is developing Downtown Markham, which will eventually create 3,500 new homes in a combination of mid and high-rise condominiums in the area between Warden Avenue and Kennedy Road north of Highway 407.

"It is a 10-year project, which will not only reshape Markham but will also meet a deep need for housing options other than single family and detached," explains Mr. Tripodi. "That is where the real satisfaction comes from. It is like at Viva; we know we are helping preserve what exists while creating new opportunities for the families who love the area."

The Viva sales office is situated at 4 De Quincey Boulevard, just north and west of the site. Sales office hours are from noon to 6 p.m. Monday through Thursday, from noon to 5 p.m. on Friday and from noon to 6 p.m. weekends and holidays. JVS psychologist receives award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Ruth Borchiver, the chief psychologist at Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto, received the Benjamin S. Lowenstein Award at the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services' (IAJVS) annual conference last month in Los Angeles.

"The award honours an individual who demonstrates significant and noteworthy contributions to the JVS field and shows remarkable leadership qualities," said Genie Cohen, the executive director of the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services Affiliated Agencies in the United States, Canada and Israel.

The annual award was established by Lowenstein, a past IAJVS president.

JVS of Greater Toronto is a not-for-profit charitable organization that partners with government and business to assist individuals in overcoming obstacles to success. Last year, JVS served 12,000 people in employment, youth, and immigrant programs and services for the elderly.

Ruth Borchiver (right) receives an award at the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services in Los Angeles. With her is Karen Goldenberg, president and CEO of JVS Toronto.

"Through her leadership, guidance, direction and influence, [Borchiver] spearheaded the growth and development of this program. From one day school, JVS now operates in 12 day schools on 21 campuses with a population of more than 6,000," said Karen Goldenberg, president and CEO of JVS Toronto.

"Ruth Borchiver has been a guiding force at JVS Toronto for more than 38 years," Goldenberg said. "Her drive, professionalism and vision have been an inspiration. Ruth never hesitates to extend herself beyond expectations to meet the challenges and demands of her work and to help colleagues and clients."

Borchiver said she had an opportunity at the conference to showcase a new Toronto program, Tikun Chaim, which provides services to Orthodox day schools. "By and large, these schools had no psychological services. We were delighted with the enthusiastic response to this program."

She said the award "came as a crowning experience to a long career of serving Jewish day schools in Toronto. It was like a validation of helping children proceed through a demanding double language program of Jewish and English studies."

Children, she said, are in the forefront of social changes. "Attitudes to family life, gender issues, family breakdowns require a new approach to education. Children are impacted by these changes that require understanding and adjustment to their needs."

She noted that these changes have led to many new theories of education and have challenged schools and professionals to deal with their attendant emotional and behavioural problems.

The cabinet is made up of high-powered group of philanthropists and businesspeople and includes Gerald Schwartz, Izzy Asper, Larry Tanenbaum, Brent Belzberg, Julia Koschitzky, Stephen Cummings, Stephen Reitman and Ron Stern.

To better gauge the changes that needed to be made in community advocacy efforts, the CIC commissioned a massive research project by GPC International, a government and public relations firm headed by Hershell Ezrin. The polling, which was followed up by several focus group evaluations, took place between October 2002 and May 2003 and examined "the public's knowledge of Israel and Canadian policy."

More than 2,000 people were sampled, Fogel said. "There were some disturbing results in terms of the extent to which Canadians don't identify with Israel," he said. "To a majority of Canadians, Israel is not viewed as a sister democracy that practices freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion – all the touchstones of shared values we talk about. That doesn't translate down to Joe Canadian. Israel and the Middle East are seen as tent-dwellers, with sand between their toes, banana republics," he said.

"For average Canadians, there is a substantial gap between perceptions and the reality as we know it."

Without a visceral connection to Israel, Canadians take an even-handed approach to the Mideast conflict and expect their government to do the same. While there is a strong association in the public's mind between Palestinians and terrorism, Israelis too are associated with random killings, though slightly less than Palestinians, Fogel said.

Fogel suggested the Canadian public would more closely identify with Israel if the CIC and other advocacy groups emphasized the similarities between the two countries. Canadian foreign policy would likely follow.

Focus group studies showed that "when Canadians became more aware of the shared values between Canada and Israel, they approach it from a different perspective. When they learn Israel places a lot of value on education, with seven universities, a bombing of a university cafeteria takes on a different meaning," he said.

Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, whose mandate includes addressing anti-Semitism, said he had seen only an executive summary of the report. While he acknowledges there has been a shift in the public's attitudes to Israel and Jews, "this was a snapshot of attitudes to Israel at a particular point in time. It's wise to acknowledge the shift in attitudes, but I'm not going to rush to judgment."

The report does "give pause," he said, particularly its finding that "attitudes we took for granted may not be quite there… Canadians see it as a battle between two peoples and Canada should remain neutral. There's no real appreciation of the historical basis for Israel's right to exist.

"As Canadian Jews, we can no longer afford to be complacent and assume the majority of Canadians are sympathetic to Israel's cause without us doing more work," he said.

The CIC, meanwhile, has stepped up its "bread and butter" activities, increasing the number and size of its missions to Israel, Fogel said.

Where once the CIC sponsored two annual missions of six to eight participants each, missions this year are more likely to include 25-30 participants. So far this year, there were three media trips, one involving Parliament Hill staffers and grassroots advocacy leaders. Two more missions of Hill staff are scheduled for the summer.

Aviation company flies in aid on moment's notice

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

A deadline to send Canadian peacekeepers into Afghanistan is fast approaching and Walter Arbib, the CEO of SkyLink Aviation Inc., has to find a way to get them there.

A phone in each hand, he carries on two simultaneous conversations, ironing out the details of his company's latest mission. Employees float in and out of his ornate Rosedale office, updating him on the job.

Walter Arbib

Since 1988, Arbib and his partner Surjit Babra have been in the business of transporting humanitarian aid to nations wracked by war and natural disasters.

SkyLink has sent its planes and helicopters into some of the world's most dangerous regions, including Kosovo, Angola, Congo, Rwanda and Afghanistan. While the company gets 80 per cent of its business from the United Nations, individual governments also charter its aircrafts during emergencies.

"Once we're in a place, we become a part of it," says Arbib, adding that his pilots, crew members and other employees often go beyond what is expected of them when lives are at stake.

One example is the company's commitment to removing landmines, for which it was recently honoured by the U.S. State Department.

"It's a terrible feeling to go to a place where you don't even know if you can walk because there are landmines," says Arbib, who has been recognized for his work with a salute in the 107th U.S. Congressional Record.

SkyLink made a $100,000 (US) pledge toward a project to eliminate landmines in Mozambique on the condition that the U.S. State Department match the amount dollar for dollar. The department went beyond its request, offering to give $1.50 (US) for every dollar, raising the total funds for training and high-tech equipment for de-miners to $250,000 (US).

Arbib and his staff are on call 24 hours a day, as aid must often be delivered on a moment's notice.

"We have done operations that when we started we were skeptical that we could put them together, but we did it," he says.

While on assignment, SkyLink employees must often make spur-of-the-moment decisions.

For instance, when SkyLink planes went into Rwanda in 1994, project manager Bjorn Loken found two aid workers with meagre supplies struggling to care for an enormous deluge of orphans. He immediately set up an orphanage for more than 900 displaced children. In the mission that relief workers deemed "Operation SkyLink," the company air-lifted clothing, food and medical supplies to the orphans.

During the civil war in Angola in 1992, SkyLink sent 40 helicopters into the war-torn country to transport hundreds of refugees to safety in South Africa. The fleet was dispatched within seven days, says Arbib.

"All the people around here couldn't sleep for a week because we were working day and night," he says.

Meanwhile, the SkyLink crew in the southern African nation found themselves trapped in a hail of machine gun fire and narrowly missed an exploding grenade.

Although SkyLink employees often find themselves in life-threatening situations, they are trained not to take any unnecessary risks, says Arbib.

"There is a risk even in crossing the road," he says, adding that there have only been a few casualties in the past 15 years, including one pilot who was killed by a landmine while on the mission in Angola.

"That maybe is the reason landmines came into our lives," says Arbib.

Arbib was born in Israel and worked for many years at a travel agency there. In 1988, he moved to Toronto with his Canadian wife, Edie. Though he loves living in Canada, Arbib says he still feels a strong connection to his homeland and visits there frequently.

While it is most well-known for its humanitarian work, SkyLink also operates a car rental company, an air-courier service and a discount ticket agency.

The Toronto-based company, which began with five employees and an annual revenue of $5 million (US), now has a 300-member staff and seven offices on three continents, with a new one opening up in Italy in the next few months.

Transporting humanitarian relief has yeilded enormous profits for SkyLink, but Arbib said it's impossible to separate business from personal affairs.

"It's very difficult to say you are not involved and that you are just there to do business," he said.

Peretz school reunion set for August

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Laurie Mainster is expecting close to 1,000 alumni from as far away as Ireland, England and Israel to be in Winnipeg on the August long weekend to celebrate the 90th anniversary of the I.L.Peretz Folk School.

"The response has been overwhelming," says Mainster, the chair of the reunion committee. "Hundreds of registrations have poured in and the excitement is growing. This is going to be a once-in-a-lifetime weekend that honours the place of Yiddish and Peretz School in all our lives and the community at large."

The alumni weekend starts Friday, Aug.1, with an evening of music and camaraderie. Saturday evening will feature a concert with professional entertainers and Peretz alumni Herschel Fox, Kenny Maslow, Aubrey Tadman and Vicki Knight, all of whom now live in southern California.

On Sunday, alumni can peruse an exhibit at the Jewish Heritage Centre and enjoy a gala dinner in the evening. On Monday, a bus tour is planned of Winnipeg's "Jewish North End," with stops at City Hall and the site of the old YMHA buildings downtown. The weekend ends with a reception at the University of Manitoba.

The Yiddish-language Peretz School was started on the first anniversary of the death of Yiddish author I.L. Peretz with North America's first kindergarten class.

By the mid-1930s, the school had an enrolment of more than 500 students, making it the largest Yiddish school in North America. Students studied half a day in English and half a day in Yiddish. Classes went up to Grade 7, with an evening program for students who wanted to continue to Grade 12.

By the 1970s, enrolment was in decline, because Winnipeg's Jewish population was shrinking and because a new generation of parents wasn't very interested in Yiddish.

In 1980, the Peretz School was forced to merge with the Hebrew-language Talmud Torah. Under the merger agreement, a Yiddish track was to be included in the combined program. The Yiddish track was discontinued in the mid-1990s when the program's teacher retired.

The spirit of the Peretz School lives on in the I.L. Peretz Folk School Endowment Trust, which supports Yiddish programs in Winnipeg such as the new Yiddish course at the University of Manitoba.

Alumni who are interested in attending the reunion can call 204-582-2003 or visit www.peretzreunion.com.

MP calls Reena a 'gem' in the community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Physicians need to include parents in making decisions about children with disabilities, says MP Carolyn Bennett, who chairs a parliamentary sub-committee on the status of persons with disabilities.

"No one knows better about gaps in the system than parents of children with disabilities. They know what works and what could work better," Bennett told the annual general meeting last month of Reena, a non-profit social service agency that provides group homes, residences and support services to children and adults with developmental disabilities.

"[By forming] a partnership, we can help people move through the system," said Bennett, who is a physician.

The government must learn from models that work, such as models of inclusive decision making, choice and responsibility, she said.

"Other than cloning the Reena board, we have to find ways to replicate things that are working, and we have to celebrate gems such as Reena.

"You represent [at Reena] the model on which great countries are built – little jewels threaded together."

In the past year, executive director Sandy Keshen said in Reena's annual report, the agency concentrated on such projects as the purchase of a new group home that includes rooms for residential respite for adults; and a permanent location for the Yetta Berg Family Home for Children with Autism, a specially constructed six-bedroom group home in Maple.

Awards handed out at the meeting included the board member of distinction award to Wilfred Teper; the employer of the year award (for companies employing Reena clients that have demonstrated understanding and support of people with developmental disabilities) to Hy & Zel's drug stores; and the employee of the year award to Reena client David Berg.

In addition, Alex Eisen received a lifetime achievement award and the CBC's Miriam Tenhouse received a media appreciation award.

The Reena Foundation, Reena's fundraising board, also presented its board member of distinction award to Helen Fisch; a family philanthropy award to Al and Faye Mintz; a young leadership award to Jonah Laist and Lorne Weiss; and the Sam Handler Award to Howard Ungerman and Sylvia and Irving Ungerman.

The Trevor Rosenberg Scholarship award, which allows a Reena staff member to pursue further education on social services for individuals with a developmental disability, went to Rebecca Quigley.

Jewish jokes speak volumes, says author

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to the CJN

Rabbi Joseph Telushkin has written many serious books, but he may be best known for Jewish Humor: What the Best Jewish Jokes Say About the Jews. Jewish jokes, he says, speak volumes about what we really believe.

Rabbi Telushkin recently spoke at Beth Sholom Synagogue, an event promoted with the line: "You'll laugh… you'll cry… you'll feel guilty that you laughed and cried." Though some people oppose all ethnic humour, said the rabbi, good jokes can help us understand ourselves better.

Our famous guilt, for instance, derives from Judaism's mitzvah orientation. Despite connotations of "good deed," the word mitzvah means "commandment." Although common sense suggests it's nobler to volunteer for a task, Rabbi Telushkin said, the Talmud has more praise for actions done out of obligation, perhaps because, once obligated, we perform more consistently.

Rabbi Telushkin gave the example of dieting. An impromptu audience poll revealed that most had been on diets – and had broken them inside of three months, or even three hours.

"Compare that with the diet known as kashrut. There's no evidence that keeping kosher will make you physically more attractive or more healthy… Nobody ever got thin over a Shabbos."

Yet because people feel obligated to keep kosher, the "diet" sticks, Rabbi Telushkin said. If somebody told him, "Don't eat that chocolate cake; you'll look better, you'll feel better… I'll be thinking the whole time, 'When is this nudnik going to go away?' But if somebody comes and says some pork fell into the mix, I'd throw it away."

Beyond guilt, humour plays on Jewish values. Other religions' jokes often don't emphasize the parent-child bond, said Rabbi Telushkin, adding that many religions actually separate parents from children. He said he was once challenged on this point by someone who told him God's first commandment to Abraham was to leave his father's house.

Rabbi Telushkin's reply: "True… but he was 75 at the time."

We also mock well-known Jewish traits, he said. Though some "would have us believe that all traits are distributed evenly through different groups… Jews are not known as being the calmest of people." This is revealed by the Jewish telegram: "Start worrying. Details to follow."

Another less-stellar trait is white-collar crime. There's something resonant, Rabbi Telushkin said, in the joke about two Jewish businessmen: "One comes up to the other and says, 'So, I hear your business burned down last night.' The other one says, 'Shh… that's tomorrow night.'"

Freud believed Jews make fun of themselves more than any other group, the rabbi said. But some stereotypes are harmful and are best avoided. He said he omitted JAP jokes from his book because they have "no purpose," and depict Jewish women as "nasty and sexually cold."

Many jokes teach us by looking inward – at relationships, religion or business. Others look outward at the world with ironic courage. Jokes mocking anti-Semites like Hitler, Lenin and others usually emerged when Jews felt most powerless.

"When they couldn't fight it, all they could do was ridicule it," the rabbi said.

Our superiority in these jokes was often reinforced by our enemies. Rabbi Telushkin, who co-wrote Why The Jews? The Reason for Antisemitism with Dennis Prager, has a theory: "There are two groups of people who think Jews are brighter than everybody else: anti-Semites and Jews."

In a common joke from the 1930s – "obviously, by 1940, there was nothing left to joke about" – a Jew berates his friend for reading a Nazi newspaper. The friend replies, "You read the Forward:… there's a Depression… Jews are assimilated… Arabs are rioting… Jews are being killed… You read the Jewish paper, you get depressed. I read the Nazi newspaper: we own all the banks, we control all the governments…"

In his talk, Rabbi Telushkin explored other subjects, from psychiatry to intermarriage to absurdist humour: A grandmother pushing a carriage says, "You think he's cute? You should see his pictures."

A theme emerged through all the jokes: Judaism's perverse optimism, which the rabbi said is typified by the Israeli who, in the midst of a gloomy discussion of current events, piped up, "You know what? I'm an optimist." A friend pointed out, "If you're an optimist, why do you always look so worried?" The man replied, "You think it's easy to be an optimist?"

The CJN will not be publishing an issue on July 24.

Under pressure from France, EU decides against Hamas ban

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Under heavy pressure from France, the European Union (EU) has said it will not freeze all assets belonging to the Palestinian organization Hamas, stating that a clear distinction should be made between the political and social wings of the Islamist movement.

The European Commission, the EU's legislative body, announced late last month that it would not be acting against the political wing of Hamas, although it would retain an EU ban enforced last year on Hamas' military branch, which it regards as a terrorist organization.

The commission's view was confirmed on July 3 at a meeting of European ministers in Brussels, where a unanimous decision was made to delay a verdict on the political wing of Hamas. No date has been set to review the position.

The decision not to ban Hamas' political wing marks international uncertainty over whether it has a constructive role to play in Middle East peace talks or whether it is simply a terrorist entity.

The decision also marks a clear change in direction from the EU summit in Salonika, Greece, at the end of last month, when it appeared that those backing a total ban were in a clear majority.

According to a statement from commission spokesperson Reijo Kempinnen, Hamas' political wing is legitimate because it provides social welfare services such as running clinics and hospitals.

"You can't say that the whole of Hamas is a terrorist organization, and certainly that is not our position," Kempinnen told reporters in Brussels.

However, a more likely reason for the EU decision appeared to be that the union did not want to undermine the position of Palestinian Authority (PA) Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas in his attempts to broker an agreement with Hamas.

"The situation is still evolving in the region, and because of that it is important to keep studying it," an unnamed British diplomat reportedly said.

One of the major EU members arguing for a refrain from enforcing a total ban on Hamas was France, which continues to believe that the organization has a role in the Middle East peace process.

The French position also appeared somewhat vindicated by the announcement early last week of a ceasefire by Hamas and another Palestinian Islamist group, Islamic Jihad, as well as by the armed wing of PA President Yasser Arafat's Fatah organization.

Dominique de Villepin

Spokespeople in the French Foreign Ministry rejected demands from the U.S. administration to place both the armed and the "welfare functions" of Hamas in the same package.

"The EU has listed the armed wing, but social organizations of Hamas have also got to be listed," U.S. national security adviser Condoleezza Rice said at a conference last month in London.

"The notion that on the one hand, Hamas is peaceful, and on the other hand, is trying to blow up the peace process is just illogical and, we're saying, will not work," Rice said.

This view, however, was rejected by a spokesperson from the French Foreign Ministry.

"There has been a very clear distinction between the two wings, and the minister himself has called for that distinction to be made between the armed wings and the social organizations in the Palestinian territories," the spokesperson said at a news conference.

François Zimeray, a French member of the European Parliament, said the position adopted by the European Commission is "totally artificial."

"Only a diplomat cut off from the human reality of the situation in the Middle East could make such distinctions," Zimeray told JTA. "There is only one branch of Hamas."

Zimeray, who has led a campaign in the European Parliament to demand an investigation into the misuse of EU funds by the Palestinian Authority, said French policy was "like running with the hare and the hounds and the highest form of hypocrisy."

Until the decision, France was the only nation among the 15 members of the European Union to publicly say it opposed a ban on the non-military branch of Hamas, a policy it said would force the organization underground and prevent any possibility that it would agree to a ceasefire.

However, most of the EU members, led by Britain, continued to support Washington's view that no distinction should be made between the different organizations operating under the Hamas umbrella.

The EU position took on a different perspective, probably because as a member of the Quartet of Middle East peace-brokers – with the United States, Russia and the United Nations – it was already aware of the likelihood that Hamas might accept a ceasefire.

At a meeting with EU leaders in Washington late last month, President George W. Bush said the group should take "decisive measures against terrorist groups like Hamas, to cut off their funds and their sources of support."

Such comments, however, drew a firm rebuke from the office of the EU's commissioner for foreign affairs, Chris Patten, whose spokesperson said the EU "does not need to take lessons from anybody about how to combat terrorism."

Ironically, the current French position regarding Hamas comes at a time when France has been seeking to present a more balanced approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Recently, a number of government ministers were present at an event in Paris titled 12 Hours for France-Israel Friendship.

The event brought together politicians from across the political spectrum who affirmed their support for the State of Israel and expressed a wish that French foreign policy would return to the more favorable stance toward the Jewish state that it had before the 1967 Six Day War.

Moreover, French Jewish leaders were keen to assert the historic bonds between Israel and France at a time when relations have deteriorated, with France adopting a strong anti-war position to the U.S.-led military operation in Iraq.

Despite a generally upbeat tone at the event, Meyer Habib, the head of the event's organizing committee and a member of the executive committee of the CRIF umbrella organization of French Jews, drew widespread applause when he criticized current French policy toward Israel.

Habib said he could not understand a policy that did not recognize Hamas and the Lebanese Shi'a group "Hezbollah as terrorist organizations, and did not recognize Jerusalem as the eternal and indivisible capital of Israel."

French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin also drew the ire of the Jewish community when he met with Arafat during his recent visit to the Middle East.

In addition, de Villepin attempted to inject his own ideas into the road map peace plan sponsored by the Quartet.

In calling for an international peacekeeping force to be sent to the Middle East, de Villepin was forced to back down in the face of a lack of support from France's European partners, later describing the plan as "neither a proposal nor a project but just an idea to launch debate."

One moshav's ties to Canada

"Never before had such a spirit of jubilation been witnessed at a Zionist gathering. Delegates embraced one another and shouts of 'Mazel tov' resounded through the hall. With tears streaming from their eyes, the delegates spontaneously began to chant the Zionist anthem, Hatikvah."

Most of those present probably never dreamed what a long-term impact their decision would have. Just two weeks ago, one of the region's communities, Moshav Bitan Aharon – named after Freiman – celebrated 70 years of existence. And it is clearly flourishing.

Each of its 30-odd families has a four-dunam plot, an extraordinary amount of land in crowded central Israel; many enjoy orchards or pools in their backyards. An extension of luxury houses on the edge of the moshav's land has allowed many of the descendants of the original settlers to stay close to home, and two more neighbourhoods are currently being completed.

"None of this would have been possible without the help of A.J. Freiman," says Meir Sapir, chair of the local council, and a resident of Bitan Aharon since 1947. Pointing to a wooden sign at the entrance to the moshav, which bears Freiman's name, he says, "Everyone here knows exactly who he was, and the Canadian connection to this place."

The moshav has come a long way. When it was established in 1933, only four of the families who owned plots dared move there to eke out a living by raising cattle and chicken or tending orchards; the others chose to stay in the cities, where their income was guaranteed. Social conditions were harsh: some of the original residents were immigrants, who had no common language with the Israelis, both literally and figuratively. Physical conditions were even harsher, even by 1941, when Sapir's wife Pnina moved to the area with her parents.

"There were no roads, no electricity or phones," she recalls. "Cars would sink in the mud, so we had to use horses and carriages."

Occasionally, Arabs would infiltrate from Tulkarm and steal property. Pnina, who knew Morse code from her Girl Scouts days, used to stand guard on the water tower, signaling to neighbouring settlements.

When World War II broke out, many of the residents had to sell their plots because there was no market for their fruit.

"Much of the produce had to be destroyed," says Pnina. "People gave up."

Still, she recalls mostly happy days, often revolving around the communal activities in the social hall, which was donated by Canadian Jews, and which was initially shared with the neighbouring Moshav of Havatzelet Hasharon, named after Freiman's wife and longtime Canadian Hadassah president Lillian (Havatzelet in Hebrew). She also recalls the strong Zionist spirit in the Moshav; many of its sons founded kibbutzim, and took up good positions in the young Israel Defence Forces.

Ultimately, the moshav came into its own after the war, when many ex-servicemen from the British army joined, although conditions were still tough. Behind the Sapirs' current home stands a one-room tin shack, which was their first house as a married couple.

Today, very few of the residents make their living from agriculture. Indeed, its location – three quarters of an hour to Haifa, and minutes from Netanya – has turned the land into prime real-estate, with plots selling from about $1 million (US) each, so many of the newer residents are wealthy businessmen.

Perhaps this has helped Bitan Aharon stave off the fate of other small moshavim, which were forced to allow businesses onto their land to make ends meet.

"There's nothing like the quiet, calmness and colors in this place," says Sapir. "The quality of life is extraordinary."

For Bitan Aharon's birthday, many of the residents, and even children and grandchildren who had moved away, came together to perform a play written by Pnina about the settlement's history.

"It was like all times," Pnina says, "everyone united."

The moshav wanted to invite Freiman's descendants, who still live in Ottawa, to the celebration, but were unable to. Still, Canadian Jews have a special place in their hearts.

"Emek Hefer is one of the most beautiful places in the country," says Pnina. "We thank you for your role in its development."

Liberal MP meets Hezbollah leader

The Canadian Alliance and B'nai Brith Canada are calling on the solicitor-general to investigate a meeting between Liberal MP Tony Valeri and a senior leader of the banned terrorist group, Hezbollah.

Tony Valeri, an Ontario MP who represents the riding of Stoney Creek, near Hamilton, met with Mohammad Raad, the head of Hezbollah's parliamentary wing, during a recent parliamentary visit to Beirut.

Valeri said he asked for the meeting after some of his constituents voiced opposition to Canada's decision to list Hezbollah as a terror organization. He subsequently expressed his regret for meeting the Hezbollah leader.

"In retrospect, I now recognize the conversation was ill-advised, and I regret any offence which may have been caused," he wrote in a letter to Rochelle Wilner, president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Valeri's letter also noted his support for Canada's ban of the group.

Stockwell Day, foreign affairs critic for the Canadian Alliance, said in a news release, "There remain many unanswered questions about the nature of the meeting, its purpose and what was really discussed. The mysterious encounter should cause all of us to be concerned."

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith asked candidates for the Liberal leadership to clarify their positions on prohibiting the activities of terrorist organizations on Canadian soil. (Valeri is reportedly a strong supporter of leadership candidate Paul Martin.)

"We want a commitment that MPs will be told to respect both the spirit and the letter of the law and will be held to account by these potential leaders if they don't," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith. "If we are ever to succeed in ridding the world of the scourge of terrorism, we need to marginalize such groups as much as possible. Meetings such as the one Valeri arranged undermine such efforts."

Prisoner issue clouds ceasefire

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The issue of prisoner releases has leapt to the front burner of the Palestinian ceasefire.

On Sunday, the Israeli government approved criteria for releasing Palestinian prisoners, but Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said no prisoners who have murdered Israelis would be released, reports said.

Meanwhile, Palestinian groups called the measure insufficient, and said the week-old ceasefire could be in jeopardy if all Palestinian prisoners are not released. Even as the spotlight was thrown on the possible releases, other issues such as further Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the progress made in curbing violence during the past week were also discussed.

At Sunday's Cabinet meeting, the measure passed in its third vote by a 13-8 count. The ministers agreed to the resolution after it was amended to include the creation of a ministerial committee on prisoner releases, and after a clause was added stressing that the release is dependent upon Palestinian commitment to fight terrorism.

During the meeting, families of terror victims demonstrated outside the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem against prisoner releases. The government decision is expected to pave the way for the release soon of some 400 Palestinian prisoners – about 250 administrative detainees and 135 Palestinians held for criminal offenses, reports said.

Israel is believed to currently hold about 4,500 Palestinians in detention, the reports said.

The Palestinian Authority's information minister, Nabil Amr, said Palestinians had expected a larger release.

"This is an insufficient step," he said, adding that the United States would be called on to pressure Israel to free all prisoners.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad went further. Hamas demanded that Israel release all its members, while Islamic Jihad called the decision a Zionist maneuvre, raising questions over whether the decision would affect the group's declared ceasefire on attacks against Israel.

At Sunday's meeting between Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and Palestinian security chief Mohammed Dahlan, Dahlan reportedly asked that Israel drop the criteria it established for the release of the prisoners, Army Radio reported.

The Palestinians also reportedly demanded that the Israeli military redeploy from three more Palestinian cities, including Ramallah, and lift the blockade that still remains in effect around Bethlehem, Army Radio said.

Mofaz, one of the outspoken critics of the road map peace plan, said there have been fewer terror alerts since Israel handed over security responsibility to the Palestinians in the West Bank town of Bethlehem and parts of the Gaza Strip.

He also said after the talks that he came away with the impression that the Palestinians want to renew the peace process, Israel Radio reported.

But Mofaz said Palestinian leaders would be judged on their actions, not their words.

New Iranian missile threat worries Israel

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom said last Friday he hopes the International Atomic Energy Agency and international powers will pressure Iran to allow weapons inspectors into the country and to sign additional nonproliferation agreements guaranteeing it has no intention to develop nuclear weapons.

Shalom's comments came just before a Tehran Foreign Ministry spokesperson confirmed Monday that Iran has conducted a final test on a long-range, surface-to-surface Shihab-3 missile, which has a range that can reach Israel.

"The radical regime in Iran is threatening the stability not only of the state of Israel, but the European countries also," Shalom said. "Iran is a danger to the stability of all the world."

The launch was the most successful so far of the seven or eight tests of the missile over the last five years, and has increased worries in Washington – which spotted the test with its tracking mechanisms – and in Israel.

If the assessment proves to be true that the missile, which was launched from east to west, had an effective range beyond the 1,300-kilometre red line, meaning the range from western Iran to Israel, the Iranians could position the launching pads for the rocket deeper inside their country.

The Iranian threat will be one of the subjects under discussion when Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon visits the Pentagon and U.S. armed forces bases this week.

Ya'alon's itinerary is scheduled to include the Florida headquarters of two key commands: Centcom and special operations at MacDill Air Force Base.

More data is now being collected in the West about the missile test and about the progress being made in the Iranian missile program, which is based on North Korean missiles.

In previous tests, when the rocket was powered by a North Korean engine, the tests were successful, but when the engines were Iranian-made, even with North Korean know-how, they tended to fail – despite statements by Iranian Defence Minister Ali Shakhmani in 2002 that Iran can "develop everything" and does not need help from foreign sources like China or Russia.

The report of the Shihab-3 test is an incentive for Israel equipping itself with more Arrow missiles made by the Israel Aircrafts Industries and soon to go into a joint production process with Boeing.

Israel is also concerned about the growing ties between Iran and Libya. Indeed, the Libyan threat is now the reason for a third Arrow battery even though the Iraqi threat is gone.

Western experts said the 16-metre single-stage Shihab-3, which can carry up to a ton of explosives in its payload, is not very accurate, with the probability of hitting within three kilometres of any target it is launched at. But it is possible that its aim has been improved over the past year. In any case, the missile range already includes Israel, Turkey, the Indian subcontinent and American forces in the Gulf. Iran has plans for two longer-range missiles: a Shihab-4, with a 2,000-kilometre range and a Shihab-5, with a 5,500-kilometre range.

The last Shihab missile test resulted in a Bush administration statement expressing "serious concerns" about the Iranian missile project, which is a "threat to the region and U.S. interests."

The next commander of Centcom, Gen. John Abizaid, who replaced Tommy Franks on Monday, testified two weeks ago to a Senate committee that "Iran has the largest ballistic missile inventory in the Central Command region to include long-range weapons of mass destruction and delivery systems capable of reaching deployed U.S. forces in the theatre."

"Iran's long-term ability to develop nuclear weapons remains a source of serious concern," he warned.

Abizaid told the committee that "Iran casts a shadow on security and stability in the Gulf region. Iran's military is second only to the United States. U.S. allies in the Gulf acknowledge Iran's increasingly proactive efforts to soften its image and appear less hegemonic; however, Iran's military poses a potential threat to neighbouring countries."

Survey: Israeli students rank among world's weakest

By RELLY SA'AR

JERUSALEM — One-third of Israeli 15-year-olds with 9-10 years of schooling lack basic reading skills, according to an international survey released last week.

The survey also revealed Israel to be the most polarized western country for the gaps in reading skills and knowledge of math and science between top students from well-off homes and weak students from poor homes.

The Program for International Student Assessment (PISA-2000) survey on industrialized states (OECD) was published simultaneously in the 41 countries that took part in the research. Some 4,500 Israeli youngsters scored an average grade of 453 in the reading-skills section of the survey, positioning them in the bottom third on the international achievement scale, with a ranking of 30 out of the 41 participating countries.

Finnish students ranked first, averaging a score of 546 points. American students were also placed in the top third of the scale.

To quantify the students' reading comprehension, the survey ranked their abilities according to five levels, with one being the lowest and five being the highest.

Only four per cent of Israeli students were in the fifth level, while one-third were in the first level or below. Almost 20 per cent of Finnish students were in the fifth level.

The PISA survey included some 300,000 students worldwide and was based on data collected two years ago. Head researchers Bracha Karmarsky and Prof. Zmira Mevarech, the head of the education department at Bar-Ilan University, interpreted the data.

The Israeli students also performed poorly in the other subjects included in the survey, and were ranked 33rd in both math and sciences, with a score of 433 in math and 434 in science. Their scores in reading comprehension, math and science were the lowest among the world's developed countries. The Ministry of Education decided last Monday to set up a panel of experts to look into the poor results.

Sharon told the conference he would make more budget cuts, major reforms and interest rate cuts.

Which occupation are we talking about?

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

A certain serenity and timelessness descends on Jerusalem's Old City on Friday afternoons, when Muslims, Jews and Christians are busy dialoguing with their gods.

But on the last weekend in June, a walk through east Jerusalem and the Muslim Quarter left me feeling that a chasm had emerged in the Middle East, and it all revolved around the meaning of one word – occupation.

Feature

I was in Israel with a group of journalists in order to engage writers, intellectuals and artists in discussion and debate. I wanted to hear how Israelis – from left to right – and Palestinians – from leadership to street – felt about possible solutions to the violence that has enveloped both sides and the roadblocks that stand in the way of the unfolding road map to peace.

This model of Israel, the West Bank and Gaza was found last year in a school in the West Bank by the Israeli army.

The most optimistic voice was presented by Sari Nusseibeh, president of Al-Quds University and co-author of No Trumpets, No Drums: A Two-State Settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict. Along with former Israeli intelligence chief Ami Ayalon, the Harvard-educated professor of philosophy heads an organization called the Peoples' Voice.

"Palestinians and Israelis are strategic allies because we share a common future. Neither the Americans nor the Arab world are here," Nusseibeh said.

Convinced change needs to begin at the grassroots, he described a full-page advertisement that his group published in Al-Quds newspaper on June 5 and in Ha'aretz on June 29. It was a petition that laid out a "destination map" – a six-point statement of intentions that could satisfy claims on both sides of the conflict. As of July 1, 1,700 Palestinians had joined his group, along with more than 10,000 Israelis.

According to Nusseibeh, a solution to the current bottleneck depends on the creation of two states for two peoples and the declaration by both sides that "Palestine is the only state of the Palestinian people and Israel is the only state of the Jewish people."

Despite insults, public criticism and death threats over his declaration that "Palestinian refugees would return only to the State of Palestine and Jews would return only to the State of Israel," Nusseibeh appears willing to hold firm on his belief that the end of the current Israeli-Palestinian conflict can be achieved if Israel pulls pack to the June 4, 1967, borders and ends its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Just outside Jerusalem, we met David Boulos, the Muslim public relations manager of Neve Shalom, a co-operative village that promotes itself as a home to "Jews and Palestinian Arabs of Israeli citizenship." According to Neve Shalom's Web site, its nursery, kindergarten and primary school attempt to nurture "each child's identity by imparting a knowledge of his/her culture and tradition while inculcating a knowledge and respect for the culture and tradition of the other people."

However, one holiday the two groups can't share is Yom Ha'atzmaut – Israel's Independence Day.

"While one group wants to celebrate, the other does not," Boulos said.

For him, the occupation began in 1948 with the creation of the State of Israel, and the ideal solution to the conflict is one state for all citizens in Israel and Palestine.

Later that week, we stopped at Al-Quds University's Institute of Modern Media in Ramallah, where a few years ago, an Israeli-Palestinian version of Sesame Street was produced. That show has been shelved and Ayman Bardawil, the director of the educational television division, now talks mainly about the military occupation of Palestine.

Pictures such as this one of shahids (martyrs) cover the basement walls of Al-Quds University's Institute of Modern Media in Ramallah, where students gather for recreational breaks.

While Bardawil described how television is used to widen the perception of children, I watched a live broadcast of two animated cartoons. One depicted Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon smashing a dove holding an olive branch as they are revealed from underneath a hat bearing the American flag. The other portrayed U.S. President George W. Bush standing on a table dropping a yo-yo, only to quickly pull it up just as a man lunges for it.

Bardawil explained that all views are presented on the station, and then turned off the live broadcast to show a video of the institute's premises taken in April 2002, after Operation Defensive Shield. The film shows smashed furniture, broken equipment and filthy offices left in a disarray.

"A lawsuit is pending in the Israeli courts," he said.

Toward the end of my visit to Israel, I stopped at a shop in the shuk in the Old City in Jerusalem, where Arabian incense and the callings of the muezzin fill the Muslim Quarter.

Once it became clear that nothing would be purchased, conversation turned to the current conflict.

The young, Western-looking shopkeeper – who resembled many Israelis in his blue jeans and t-shirt – served sweetened Turkish coffee out of plastic cups while he explained that the only way to solve the problem is "for the Arab world to unite with one face.

"The only leader that can do this successfully is [Osama] bin Laden," he said.

"I am not religious," he added, "but I believe that bin Laden is the only one who can unite the Arab people."

While Hamas and its supporters openly tie themselves to the Islamist elements inherent in bin Laden's movement, it would appear that now many secular Palestinians also endorse his views. For bin Laden, the "occupation" includes all western elements in the Muslim world.

A survey for the U.S.-based Pew Global Attitudes Project, released last month, revealed that 71 per cent of Palestinians named Bin Laden as the world leader most likely to "do the right thing" in world affairs.

At the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah, director Khalil Shikaki revealed that polls also indicated that most Palestinians are unaware of what transpired at Camp David and don't believe bin Laden was behind the Sept. 11 attacks.

I recalled that earlier in the week, Ruth Wisse, the soft-spoken Harvard professor of comparative literature, explained that the current dispute is not about the occupation of land and bears "no relationship to a conflict of two people over one territory.

"If it had been that, it would have been resolved a long time ago," she said.

Wisse said that Arab leaders use anti-Semitism, the occupation and the war against Israel to sidestep their own domestic problems and as a tool to legitimize their control of the courts, education systems and media.

Liberation from the occupation by the Jews becomes justification for authoritarian rule.

This is not merely a clash between Israelis and Palestinians, she stressed.

"Once Arab leaders have used Israel and anti-Semitism to their ends, the United States will be next."

ISRAEL BLACKLISTS THE BBC FOR "ANTI-SEMITIC" DOCUMENTARY

Israel severed all ties with the British Broadcasting Corporation in late June after the network broadcast a documentary critical of its unconventional weaponry and claiming that Israel used nerve gas against the Palestinians.

The BBC has "repeatedly tried to de-legitimize the State of Israel" and its attitude "demonizes the Israelis," said government press officer Danny Seaman.

Declaring that the BBC's overall attitude towards Israel was "verging on the anti-Semitic," representatives from the Prime Minister's Office, Foreign Ministry and the Government Press Office have begun discussing whether to expel all BBC correspondents from the country.

In the meantime, they have imposed visa restrictions and will no longer assist BBC staff to bypass military roadblocks in the territories, government sources said. Israeli spokespeople will also refuse all future interview requests from the network.

"The BBC will discover that bureaucracy can be applied with goodwill or without it," Seaman told the London Times. "And after the way that they have repeatedly tried to de-legitimize the State of Israel, we, as hosts, have none left for them."

The offending program, titled Israel's Secret Weapon, was first broadcast in March. "The weapons program, which contains the ridiculous false assertion that we used nerve gas against the Palestinians, was the last straw," Seaman said.

"We decided that we had to draw a red line rather than just complain about a consistent attitude in which successive BBC programs attempt to place us in the same context as totalitarian, axis-of-evil countries such as Iraq and Iran."

Given CBC Newsworld's habit of televising BBC documentaries about Israel (Behind the Fence, on Israel's security fence, being a recent example), one hopes our national network will choose not to air this latest one and find more balanced programming instead.

Techelet TV: Shlomo Ben-Zvi, a 38-year-old British immigrant, has launched a new pay-TV channel on Israel's cable and satellite networks after winning the tender for a "Jewish" channel against stiff competition, the London Jewish Chronicle has reported.

A scion of a monied British clan, Ben-Zvi has named his network Techelet, after the indigo-like blue dye that the Torah prescribes for use on one of the strings of the tallit. (The dye's provenance, recently rediscovered after being lost for some 14 centuries, is again being used in some circles to fulfil the biblical mitzvah.)

For 19 hours daily, Techelet broadcasts a combination of local and imported fare, much of it spotlighting Jewish and Zionist history. To liven up the schedule, Ben-Zvi has commissioned a soap opera about a large and quarrelsome Israeli chassidic family, to be titled The Rebbe's Court.

It will be "the first-ever Jewish soap opera," he said, while the Chronicle calls it "East Enders... with fringes and a sheitl." Ben-Tvi considers the soap opera to be a Jewish form because "every 15 seconds you have a dilemma of interpersonal relationships – and you have to solve them." Techelet's studio and offices are in Neve Ilan, outside Jerusalem.

Early Gitai films can be ordered

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

One of the things this column tries to accomplish is to keep readers informed of new "Jewish" releases as they become available on video or DVD. Not all of these releases will be found in your local video store. Some, such as this week's selections, are available mainly via the internet or by mail order.

Facets Multi-Media is one of the largest video retailers in the world. Located in Chicago, Facets has a huge selection of titles, many of which are very difficult, or impossible, to find anywhere else.

Facets recently released five feature films directed by Israeli filmmaker Amos Gitai. Gitai is well known for such controversial films as Kaddosh and Kippur.

Now Facets has released five of Gitai's earlier films and these are available as a set, called Amos Gitai: Exile, or they can be purchased individually. They are also available on either VHS or DVD.

The common feature of all these films, is that they address the subject of exile. The first film, Esther, was produced in 1987 and updates the Biblical story of Esther.

It uses Biblical sources in an attempt to explore the world as it exists today. The second film, Berlin Jerusalem tells the story of two women who seek a new life in the Holy Land. One of the women, Else Lasker-Schuler, is a German expressionist poet. The other woman is Mania Shohat, a Russian revolutionary. They meet in Jerusalem and are disappointed by the real city they see but remain committed to building a better world.

Birth Of A Golem is a relative short (60 minutes) and unusual film that explores ideas for a feature film on the theme of the Golem. It has been described as a "dazzling, powerful parable about the creative process--and the many forms it takes"

Golem: The Spirit of Exile uses the Book of Ruth and other Biblical stories and fuses them with the legend of the Golem to create a parable for the modern world. Elimelech, his wife Naomi and their sons move to a new city where Elimelech dies and the sons are murdered. Afterward, Naomi becomes much closer to Ruth, one of her son's widows, and together they face the uncertain future.

Montreal duo produces CD tribute to support Israel

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

MONTREAL — After the bombing at Hebrew University in Jerusalem in July, 2001, Lisa Rubin and Elan Kunin decided to do something for Israel.

So the Montreal duo, who call themselves "entertainers with a social conscience," wrote and produced a CD tribute to Israel, with a portion of the proceeds going to Israeli charities.

"We didn't know exactly how to help the cause as musicians and artists," says Rubin. "The idea came to us to write a song about Israel."

The sound for Future History is carried by Rubin's powerful vocals and Kunin's soulful instrumentals. Fans of the Prince of Egypt soundtrack will enjoy this single.

Kunin, 31, and Rubin, 25, say the title was the first thing they thought of. They liked it because it emphasized taking action now to create a better future.

"Jewish history tends to celebrate the fact that we survived a historical event, and as a result this song is basically a wake-up call," says Kunin.

"Jewish history is important to our survival,"says Rubin, finishing Kunin's sentences. "Today will be history for tomorrow. If you work to help Israel now we'll have a brighter future history."

The lyrics took three days to write, but the process took four months. Kunin wrote the music first, then the two wrote the words together.

"When I wrote [the music] I was thinking in terms of Hebrew words and it fell into place," says Kunin.

They came to Toronto to record the CD at Phase One studios – the same studio the Barenaked Ladies use – with the help of owner Barry Lubotta.

Rubin stresses that their music is not religious. "It's Zionist more than anything else," she says.

"And about community," adds Kunin.

The chorus of the song illustrates the themes they speak of.

"An ancient voice calls me to Zion/
The land that holds a part of me."

The lyrics continue to make reference to Israel as a spiritual home and to the soldiers who protect it.

The two have a personal connection to Israel. Rubin spent a year in Israel, and had a friend at Hebrew University when the bomber struck. Kunin's mother lives in a suburb of Tel Aviv. He and Rubin are hoping to visit over Sukkot.

Kunin, who wrote and composed the music, says his love of music stems from childhood.

"Growing up in a very Zionist home, I listened to a lot of Hebrew music and traditional folk songs," he says. Rubin reminds him that his musical background – he's also an orchestrator – helped him write the music for Future History because he knows how to blend the sounds into a final product.

Rubin has been studying voice, music and dance since she was a child. In 2000, she was Diana Barry in the Anne of Green Gables festival in Charlottetown, PEI.

The two met in 2000 in a production of The Great Houdini at the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre. Kunin wrote the music and played the role of Houdini, and Rubin had a solo cameo as a show girl. The next year they both had lead roles in Double Identity and travelled with the theatre to perform in Vienna.

Elan Kunin and Lisa Rubin.

Proceeds from the CDs go to Magen David Adom, Association for the Well being of Israeli Soldiers and Victims of Terror. The Future History Web site (www.thefuturehistory.com) is scheduled to be up and running shortly.

Rubin and Kunin will be performing in Toronto at Shuk in the Park on Sept. 7.

Young filmmaker's project explores an unusual career

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Filmmakers are taught to write what they know, but sometimes a piqued curiosity can spark research into original territory. Yon Motskin, 25, explored a job many people barely recognize: that of the cutman.

Motskin, a Toronto native recently transplanted to Los Angeles, wrote and directed his thesis film The Cutman for his final year at New York University's Tisch School of the Arts. The 27-minute short, which has been receiving acclaim in festivals across North America, was screened at Toronto's Worldwide Short Film Festival in June.

The Cutman was recently chosen best short at the Atlanta Film Festival; as a result, the film is now being considered for an Academy Award nomination for best live action short in 2004.

Motskin says The Cutman, which took two years to complete, tells about the fall of a boxing cutman, the grizzled man who sews up cuts and stems bleeding between rounds. Family tension figures prominently after the cutman is fired and moves in with his son.

"I had no idea a lot of people would want to see a movie about an old guy losing his job," Motskin said from his new home in west Hollywood. But word spread about the film's artistic merit and people arrived in surprising numbers to check out what the young filmmaker had produced.

The awards piled up: NYU's Wasserman/King best film and best director prizes; Gold Jury special prize at Worldfest Houston; the Brett Ratner Film award; and an invitation from FOX Searchlab to develop a script of his choosing.

The excitement is opening doors for the Thornlea S.S. graduate. He recently got an agent and a manager, and said he is writing a feature film script for The Cutman and shopping the idea around to such film companies as Miramax and Showtime.

"I've been shaking so many hands I feel like a politician," he said half-jokingly, remarking on how filmmakers must not only perfect their craft but also hone their business skills.

"I'm goal-oriented and I'm not waiting until I achieve a goal. I can handle the ritual, the day-to-day stuff. It's part of the package."

The Cutman had its roots in a journalistic seed. Motskin's friend at NYU, Timothy Fitzsimmons, was working on an article about infamous cutman Al Gavin, who works with boxers such as Oscar de la Hoya and Lennox Lewis.

When Motskin heard about the idea, he thought even though he doesn't like boxing, it would make an interesting film. He cast Fitzsimmons as the cutman's son, then cast a former firefighter chief in the lead role.

With Gavin as the technical adviser, teaching the youngsters about coagulants and stitches, The Cutman was shot on a $25,000 budget. Despite the inexperience of the actors, the film conveys a perfect balance of emotion and tension, woven between scenes that are both artistic and gritty.

"I immersed myself in that world," Motskin said, and he recalls the gym in Long Island where he learned from Gavin about relationships in the boxer's corner. The cutman may only have 30 seconds to temporarily heal the wounds, but Motskin says there are enough politics to fill a book.

The film develops a strong father-son theme, focusing on a tempestuous bond that reflects Motskin's early times with his own father.

"We disagreed a lot," he said, "even disagreeing about my chosen line of work."

Motskin first followed in his father's footsteps in Montreal, where he studied photography at McGill University. Finding his father's passion didn't reflect his own, Motskin switched to film at New York, watching 10 movies a week to fuel his hunger.

"I thought, 'Am I overexposing myself? Is it bad seeing so many of these movies?' No way, because in the end I have to see what came before."

The direction taken by the writer-director's career may have been set very early in his life: his mother has recorded on her camcorder every pivotal moment in the Motskin family saga, and appropriately enough, Motskin is now filming his own version.

Author was inspired by Holocaust survival of five siblings

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The survival of the five Garfinkel siblings struck Suzan Hagstrom as nothing less than a small miracle.

Nathan Garfinkel and his sisters, Sonia, Regina, Helen and Bela, lived through the fire and the storm of the Holocaust as virtually a family unit.

"The story of a sole survivor is common, but five in one single family is really amazing and rare," explained Hagstrom, a freelance journalist from San Diego.

Hagstrom was so impressed by their tale of fortitude and endurance that she wrote a book about the Garfinkels, Sara's Children: The Destruction of Chmielnik, published by Sergeant Kirkland's Press.

Suzan Hagstrom

Since it came out two years ago, Hagstrom has made the rounds of book stores, libraries and organizations in the United States publicizing it.

Last month, Hagstrom discussed her book at the Toronto conventions of the Association of Jewish Libraries, the Canadian Library Association and the American Library Association.

Sara's Children has not exactly soared to the top of the best-seller lists, but this is of little concern to her.

"I didn't write it to make money, but as a journalistic response to a great story of survival. Anyone who has met the Garfinkels has said, 'Someone should write a book or make a movie about them.'"

Hagstrom, a seasoned 49-year-old reporter who has worked for newspapers in Florida, Virginia and California, stumbled upon the Garfinkel saga in 1990.

While gathering data for a magazine piece for the Orlando Sentinel about the Holocaust Memorial Resource and Education Center in Orlando, the first Holocaust museum in Florida, she met Helen Garfinkel Greenspun.

"When Helen, a museum volunteer, told me that not only she, but her brother and three sisters survived exploitation in slave-labour camps in Poland, transfer to worse camps in Germany and a death march in the final month of World War II, I was amazed."

So amazed that she decided to write a book, her first one.

Hagstrom, a business writer of Scandinavian, British and French ancestry who was born in Kansas and grew up in the San Francisco area, wrote Sara's Children in her spare time.

She interviewed the Garfinkels – three of whom now live in Detroit – and talked with other survivors from Toronto, all of whom are originally from the Polish town of Chmielnik.

The Torontonians include Bela Nozyce Sztrauch, Mandzia Wajchendler Mapa, Faye Goldlist, Irving Buchbinder, Esther and Usher Tarek, Kuba and Cesia Zaifman and Lola and Jakob Sylman.

During the Holocaust, Nathan, now 83, was incarcerated in four camps in Poland and one in Germany.

Sonia and Helen, 79 and 76 respectively, stuck together as they struggled through the war. Regina, 73, and sister Bela, who died in 1997, also made it through the Holocaust together.

Hagstrom said the sisters always helped each other, and that was the key to their survival.

Toward the close of the war, the five Garfinkels were reunited in an ammunition factory in Czestochowa, Poland.

Three of the sisters married Holocaust survivors, and all the siblings immigrated to the United States.

"They worked hard and realized the American dream," Hagstrom said. "They are now comfortably retired."

She spent seven years researching, writing and trying to sell the manuscript. Fifty publishers rejected it, and still others liked it but found it of no commercial value.

Finally, Hagstrom settled on Sergeant Kirkland's Press, an independent publishing house in Spotsylvania, Va., that specializes in the U.S. Civil War.

Much to her delight, the Garfinkels were happy with the book. "They're grateful their story has been recorded."

To Hagstrom, the Holocaust was not a new topic. "I've always been interested in it."

But she can't say whether she will address it again as a writer. "I don't know what the future holds."

Hagstrom regards Holocaust deniers with contempt. "I just find their revisionism preposterous. They do it just to hurt Jews. It's a form of anti-Semitism, basically."

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Like novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald's mysterious man about town, Jay Gatsby, iconic fashion designer Ralph Lauren is a figment of his own imagination.

Previously known as Ralphie Lifshitz, Lauren epitomizes the self-made man of the fabled American dream.

He is a lower-middle class Jewish boy from New York City whose success hinges on his understated clothes and a line of subsidiary products symbolizing Anglo-Saxon gentility and wealth.

As Michael Gross, the author of Genuine Authentic: The Real Life of Ralph Lauren (HarperCollins), claims, Lauren's modus operandi is "faux authenticity."

Lauren designs and markets high-fashion garments, from khaki pants to Oxford shirts, that emphasize pedigree and style. They are bought neither by the elite nor the masses, but by well-off consumers seeking a happy medium.

"I present a dream," Gross quotes Lauren as saying in this thoroughly researched and informative biography.

The "dream" he cannily promotes is upward mobility, and that has earned him a secure place in the cutthroat world of fashion, as well as a fat bank account.

According to Forbes magazine, Lauren has a personal fortune of $2 billion (US) and counting, and is the 97th richest individual in America.

Lauren's empire encompasses eight lines of clothing for men, three more for women and a licensing company that churns out a dizzying array of goods from underwear and eyeglasses to luggage and fragrances.

In fiscal 2002, Lauren and his partners rang up $10 billion in sales. No wonder his company can afford to spend more than $200 million a year in advertising.

Lauren's ancestors hail from Pinsk, which was at various times in Lithuania, Poland and Russia. His family is related to the founders of several chassidic dynasties, Karl Marx, Helena Rubenstein and Moses Mendelssohn.

Frank, his father, fancied himself as an interior decorator, but in fact he was a house painter, a schmearer.

Frieda, his mother, wanted him to be a rabbi, and due to her influence, he briefly studied at a yeshiva.

Even back then, Lauren was light- years ahead of his classmates in terms of the preppy clothes he wore. After his bar mitzvah, he began buying his own clothes.

He changed his surname in 1959 because he could no longer abide it. "The name was a problem," Lauren said. "Kids would laugh."

While studying nights at City College, he landed successive jobs as an assistant furnishings buyer, sales assistant and supply clerk.

He found his niche as a designer, first with men's ties and shirts and then with suits and sport coats. Gross writes at length about Lauren's skills as a businessman and promoter and his fierce determination to be rich and famous.

Gross credits Lauren with reviving the Levi denim shirt and the Polo knit shirt. He is skeptical about Lauren's claim of having pioneered western wear. As he puts it: "Never mind that there was a west before him."

Jonathan Yardley, a Washington Post reporter, recognized Lauren's strategy. "Millions of Americans want to be something they are not and are prepared to spend ludicrous amounts of money in the hope of transforming themselves... Lauren's primary market is among the arrivistes."

Despite a few catty asides, Gross draws a balanced picture of his subject.

In public, Lauren is modest, gentle and purposeful. In private, he can be a terror toward those closest to him. "They are left reeling by the assaults on their self-esteem, by his need to diminish people and make them feel helpless, infantile and inept in his presence," Gross quotes a person who has known him for years.

Without the slightest substantiation, Gross claims that Lauren's "relationship to Judaism remains uneasy at best." In the next sentence, however, he blithely lists Lauren's links with Judaism.

Despite such lapses, Genuine Authentic, an unauthorized biography, usually makes for intriguing reading.

Russian theatre is 'born again' in Toronto

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

The Phoenix Cultural Diversity Theatre, one of Stage Door's theatres, has a unique name and purpose. It refers to the mythical bird that was said to have lived 500 or 600 years by repeatedly burning itself to ashes on a funeral pyre and rising again from the ashes for another life.

The name also refers to its multicultural goals. Artistic director Olga Chvedova and general manager Vladimir Milman founded the Phoenix in February 2002 as a theatre that would deliver Russian theatrical traditions to North American audiences.

Playwright's vision was based on the ideology of Aleksander Tairov, a Russian Jew born in Romny in 1885

In an interview, Chvedova, a well-known theatrical producer and playwright from Moscow with more than 20 years of experience, said her vision was based on the ideology of Aleksander Tairov, a Russian Jew born in Romny in 1885. Tairov developed his philosophy of modern theatre at the beginning of the 20th century, at the same time that world-renowned Russian actors and producers Constantin Sergeyevich Stanislavsky and Vsevolod Meyerhold were developing their own visions. Stanislavsky felt strongly that theatre should resemble real life, and Meyerhold wanted an abstract, experimental theatre.

Tairov's vision was different from the others. He felt that the theatre didn't have to resemble real life, and the barrier between the stage and the audience should remain in place. His productions were meant to be visually and audibly rich, combining elements of drama, humour, dance, tragedy and joie de vivre.

Encouraged by her Jewish father to start a theatrical career

Encouraged by her Jewish father to start a theatrical career, Chvedova said she was attracted to Tairov's ideology since the beginning. She said she felt strongly that such elements of theatre as dance, movement, stage and costume design, satire and humour should be accessible to people of all ages and backgrounds. According to Chvedova, performances are unifying experiences. Audiences become united through their feelings and reactions to a production.

The Phoenix's leading actor and choreographer, Valentyn Ovsyuk, has been a recipient of Russia's best actor award twice in the last 10 years. If Chvedova is responsible for the content and the stylistic aspect of the theatre's plays, Ovsyuk is responsible for every movement that happens onstage. As a choreographer, he invests countless hours into creating physically smooth, aesthetically pleasing performances. As an actor who plays leading roles in both Russian and English, and who conquered, many years ago, Moscow's critical audiences after only two years of acting, he sets a high standard for the rest of the cast, and for the students of the acting and modelling studio at Artwille Academy, where both Chvedova and Ovsyuk teach.

Milman, the theatre's general manager, is an information-technology specialist from a Russian-Jewish family of mathematicians. When he co-founded the Phoenix, the theatre became a vital part of his life. He and Chvedova decided then to extend their outreach beyond the Russian-speaking community. They felt it was necessary to produce and perform plays in English in order to attract English-speakers to their performances.

The Phoenix's first English-language performance, Sylvia, was put on Dec. 13, 2002, and was a groundbreaking performance. Milman's 17-year old daughter, Jane Milman, performed the lead and title role. Chvedova said her performance was "unique in the sense that she successfully combines the elements of acting with movement and dance, and weaves a story through her body, as well as words."

In another play, The Devil of Fantasy, based on the novels of Russian/English writer Vladimir Nabokov, Jane played eight different women without saying a word.

Chvedova and Milman's latest project is to adapt a play with a Jewish theme and turn it into another successful production. Meanwhile, this fall, Phoenix will be putting on another English play, I Ought To Be In Pictures, by Tony Award-winning playwright Neil Simon.

The Phoenix Cultural Diversity Theatre is located at 35 Tillplain Rd. in North York. For more information, call 416-923-6641 ext.2654.

Toronto nurse's cravings disappear along with excess weight thanks to Positive Changes

"I've lost 30 pounds in 17 weeks"

– Linda Saxe, R.N.

I've lost 30 pounds in 17 weeks since I started the program. I notice that my uniform fits better. People at work have told me that I'm in a better mood these days and I'm less stressed. I really like listening to my personal hypnosis tapes at home and this is helping.

I'm now drinking more water and I like to add ice for crunch. It seems now I'm always thirsty. I no longer drink pop or Crystal Light. I don't have any craving for them either.

"My uniform fits better"

I'm now eating more fresh fruits and vegetables; before I wasn't a big eater of fruits. I'm buying the pre-cut fresh fruit at the grocery store, so it's more convenient to eat healthy. My family knows I'm in the program and they are eating better too! My son, who's 14, is even trying to be supportive.

Three weeks ago we bought a bag of the mini Aero chocolate bars and it's still half full. I've only had three in three weeks. I now find that one soothes the craving. In the past I would have eaten the bag in one or two days. Imagine this — last night I put them in the fridge so they could stay fresh and when they are out of sight, they are out of mind too.

I'm certainly more conscious of what I'm eating. I am no longer making a conscious choice to eat better — it's happening naturally, yes automatically. I no longer shop on the junk food aisle ... before it was my first stop for every grocery store visit.

My next habit to work on is making time to have dinner on the evening shift. Sometimes I only get 10-15 minutes to eat when it's really busy at the hospital.

I'm still not convinced I am being hypnotized but it's working... and I don't really understand it... but

"I no longer shop on the junk food aisle"

I've lost 30 pounds and I know I will lose more weight.

STOP SMOKING TOO! THE POSITIVE CHANGES YOU MAKE ARE UP TO YOU!

Toronto broadcast journalist kicks smoking habit

I used to smoke half a pack a day. I tried cold turkey, the patch and the gum. Nothing worked.

This Positive Changes program has been amazing. While I quit smoking I actually lost weight!

Quitting was easy and effortless. Hypnosis is so relaxing. Why not try it yourself?

– Christina Cherneskey, CFRB

A MAJOR MEDICAL BREAKTHROUGH IN FAT REDUCTION, NOW IN TORONTO!

The Non-Surgical Alternative to Liposuction

Infusion Lipolysis™ is a new medical procedure which shrinks fat cells. Developed by Toronto cosmetic surgeon Dr. Stan Gore, it is available only from LIPIDOCTOR™ Medical Slimming Clinics. In contrast to liposuction, which removes cells surgically, the physician infuses medications directly into fatty tissue, breaking down and burning stored fat. Cells shrink as excess fat disappears.

Dr. Gore states that the procedure is safe, comfortable and affordable. "Our Spot-Slimming and Cellulite Defence Programs involve only one injection for each problem area, followed by daily, home applications of transdermal creams, custom-compounded with prescription medications. They are individually personalized for age, gender, lifestage and metabolism. Compared to surgical liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis is more gentle, less dramatic, less traumatic and a fraction of the cost!"

Most patients rapidly achieve visible, measurable improvement in contour, texture and tone. Unlike surgical liposuction, Infusion Lipolysis™ uniquely allows patients to maintain results indefinitely. "Continue our daily, one minute, home maintenance program to discourage future fat and cellulite accumulation in treated areas."

LIPIDOCTOR™ Medical Slimming Clinics also offer a unique program to optimize everyday workouts while spot-reducing fat. Their objective is improved muscle definition in problem areas in only two to four weeks. The combined prescription and natural products in their Workout Program not only diminish fat, but also enhance muscle tone, power and endurance. "Casual exercisers, fitness enthusiasts and competitive athletes all love it because it's so easy. Following your clinical procedure, simply apply maintenance Workout Cream daily, before a sports or exercise activity."

When asked what differentiates his therapy from over-the-counter remedies, Dr. Gore responds: "Infusion Lipolysis™ is a state-of-the-art clinical procedure, carried out in an established medical facility, followed by trans-dermal Rx meds. No pain; no bruising. You now really can lose fat thickness. And we will prove it to you during your no obligation, medical consultation."

In fact, Dr. Gore routinely does just that. He measures each patient's belly fat thickness with skin fold calipers, applies a test dose of one or more LIPIDOCTOR™ clinical creams and re-measures thirty minutes later.

The results are remarkable! This test also helps the doctor predict how much more fat can be lost with a complete Infusion Lipolysis™ program.

Here's the story behind Dr. Gore's discovery. "I always had problem areas of fat. I underwent two disappointing liposuction procedures in my 40's. They weren't the easy fix I had hoped for. Results were not permanent; I still had to exercise regularly and count calories. In the right hands, liposuction is effective surgery, particularly when major changes in body contour are required. But for smaller problem areas, flabby tummies and cellulite in particular, shouldn't there be a simpler, less invasive, less inconvenient, less expensive solution? Plus a way to maintain results longterm without lifestyle disruption & deprivation?"

It appears that now there is!

'Without our volunteers, we would close our doors. The Centre is like a family and volunteers are the heart of the family.'

Volunteers, the heart of Betel Centre

During his life in Montreal, Ed Kogut worked as a guidance counsellor, teacher and school principal. "I taught everything except French," he says. "I had the brightest kids in the school .... I even taught badminton; we won, too."

Retiring in Toronto after a lifetime in education, he brought his love of learning to the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. There he shares his experience as volunteer facilitator of the weekly Book Club. "Because we have more women in the group, I'm a feminist ... I choose stories which are sympathetic to women, that are honest and fair," he says.

Ed, 80, has high literary standards. "I don't like lewd stories, I prefer things that are more high-class, like [French author, Guy de] Maupassant, I've used almost all of his." The group of about 20 also enjoys Jewish authors.

Says Barbara Zigler, co-ordinator of Lifelong Learning at the Centre: "Ed reads the short story, researches it, discusses the symbolism, the feelings under the words. Heputs an outstanding effort into finding appropriate stories."

Beyond the Book Club, Ed stays busy around the Centre on most days, whether in the office counting money from "pushkes," or in the cafeteria picking up kosher Meals on Wheels or helping members carry food trays.

"Ed is a warm, giving volunteer," says Zigler. "He's a first-class example of what volunteering is all about in a Centre like ours."

The Centre recently honoured its 500 volunteers, most of whom are also Centre members, at its volunteer banquet. Pins and certificates were awarded for those who had served five, 10, 20 and 25 years.

Several members were singled out this year for special honours, including Sadie Rose, 89, who received the Queen's Jubilee Medal from MP Monte Kwinter for lifelong community service. This year's Lou Goldenberg Volunteer Award went to Members' Council Chair Marion Greenberg, 79. Marion is well-known at the Centre for her active participation and her no-nonsense attitude.

Larry Smith, president of the Centre called volunteers a "pillar of support," contributing ideas and injecting spirit into the daily life of the Centre. In the past year, he said, volunteers have contributed over 44,000 hours. "If I were to estimate that, it would translate to between $400,000 and $500,000 worth of time."

Volunteers are involved in every aspect of the Centre, says Sharon Chapnick, Co-ordinator of Volunteer Services. They visit homebound seniors, provide care-giver relief, deliver meals, sell event tickets, plan programs, teach courses, and assist in the office.

Chapnick believes master of ceremonies Judy Cohn is a great example of volunteers' unflagging enthusiasm. A five-year volunteer, Judy, 69, serves on Members' Council, works at the ticket sales desk and helps in the office.

"Without our volunteers, we would close our doors," Zigler says, and Chapnick agrees. "The Centre is like a family... and volunteers are the heart of the family."

New Orleans celebrates bicentennial of the Louisiana Purchase

By VIC PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

NEW ORLEANS — Jazz streaming out into the streets, corks popping, laughter everywhere. These sounds are heard year-round in New Orleans. But this year the entire state of Louisiana is celebrating like never before as it marks the bicentennial of the Louisiana Purchase.

And what a deal it was: the United States purchased 828,000 square miles of territory from Napoleonic France for $15 million. Napoleon Bonaparte wanted the money for his army and he didn't have to do any fast talking to convince U.S. president Thomas Jefferson that he was getting a bargain.

The land was later broken up into 15 states, and to this day in this part of the U.S. South, European traditions blend with Caribbean influences, and the food and the music are the stuff of legend.

There are many jazz clubs in, or within walking distance of, New Orleans' French Quarter, where the sweet trumpet of Louis Armstrong was first heard. Pete Fountain, Al Hirt and today's most popular jazz musician Wynton Marsalis, have all helped make "the Crescent City," as it's often called, a 24-7 kind of town. Besides jazz there is a large canvas of sounds, including cajun, R&B, and even Celtic music, which many natives love.

The music offers visitors a sheer sense of joy as they stroll the picturesque streets of the quarter. The heart of the area is Jackson Square, a park that at one time was the site of public executions but is now crowded with clowns, musicians, acrobats and white-faced mimes. And artists working on canvas charge reasonable rates to draw portraits. Not too far away, riverboats pound out jazz on the Mississippi River.

For a change of pace, try a leisurely ride on a river barge and travel to places off the beaten path. R/B River Explorer offers excursions that range from four to 10 days. Guests are immersed in the heritage and culture of nearby towns and cities in a safe and comfortable setting. The 730-foot-long barge holds 198 passengers and has 98 identical staterooms. At night, it's tied up to trees along the shoreline, reminiscent of Huckleberry Finn's trip down the river.

Guests can experience the mystical world of Cajun life, enjoying festive zydeco music from the locals while journeying through serene bayous and rivers. Experience the thrill of seeing wildlife up close and personal, whether it's alligators or ducks.

It wouldn't be a trip to New Orleans unless you sample the local fare. And, somewhat surprisingly, I found a glatt kosher restaurant in the heart of the French Quarter called Creole Kosher. It features tasty Creole and Cajun dishes, minus the shellfish, and Chef Gideon Daneshrad also serves up a panoply of Persian dishes from his native Iran.

After the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, Americans arrived in New Orleans en masse. As they were often unwelcome in the Creole enclave of the French Quarter, the Americans often clashed with the more established population. Even now, in the wake of recent diplomatic tension between France and the United States over the Iraq war, some insensitive citizens have gone beyond the bounds of patriotism and suggested re-naming the French Quarter.

The original New Orleans Creoles were urban-dwelling descendants of early French and Spanish settlers, and born in the colonies.

Cajuns, on the other hand, are descended from a group of Catholic, French-speaking Acadian trappers and farmers who were exiled from Nova Scotia by the ruling English Protestants in 1755. To this day, Canadians are loved and very welcome in Louisiana. The Acadians' expulsion was Louisiana's gain and the state is proud of the joie de vivre it received from French Canada.

By 1860, Louisiana had the largest Jewish population in the South. Most were descendants of Sephardi Jews who migrated to the Americas after Spain expelled them in 1492.

As well, Alsatian Jews were attracted to Louisiana by its landscape and by the area's slow southern lifestyle, both of which reminded them of what they had known in Europe. Alsation Jews began immigrating in large numbers again when Germany occupied Alsace after the Franco-Prussian war.

Ten thousand Jews fought on the Confederate side during the U.S. Civil War from 1861 to 1865. Jews were accorded the opportunity to be complete equals in the Old South, and Confederate general Robert E. Lee allowed his Jewish soldiers to observe all holy days.

Today Louisiana lingers between the Old World and the New, between history and legend. Like the Creole dish gumbo, Louisiana is a spicy mix of ingredients that complement each other. They really do speak a different language in Louisiana, the language of good food, good times and good music. All the ingredients are there for a year-round musical celebration.

Michael Rubinoff brings affordable theatre to Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Two summers ago, then-articling law student Michael Rubinoff produced and directed an original production of A Chorus Line at Toronto's St. Lawrence Centre with the understanding that no one in the cast or crew would get paid unless the venture turned a profit.

Perhaps because tickets were going for as little as $26 in a market where $100 tickets are not unheard of, Rubinoff's Chorus Line was a sell-out for seven of its eight performances, and Rubinoff happily signed 38 cheques afterward.

Since then, the 27-year-old native Torontonian has stopped trying to get the theatre out of his blood. Instead, he's developed plans to revolutionize the mid-sized theatre scene in Toronto by presenting a series of popular and affordable musicals geared to the budgets of city residents as opposed to tourists.

Since the success of Chorus Line, Rubinoff has staged several other productions, including Free To Be You and Me, a show based on a children's book edited by Marlo Thomas, and Side By Side By Sondheim, showcasing the music of theatre composer Steven Sondheim.

An upcoming production of Evita opens Aug. 8 and runs for three weeks at the Jane Mallett Theatre of the St. Lawrence Centre. The highest ticket price is $40. The lowest, for a preview performance, is just $5.

People who embark on somewhat risky sideline ventures are often advised not to give up their day jobs, but Rubinoff, until recently a lawyer with Goodman and Carr, has done just that.

"My whole concept is to present shows for shorter runs that had not been to Toronto for a while but had great success in London and New York," he says. "I thought that if they were affordable, people would come to see them."

At a time when top productions such as The Lion King and Mamma Mia! are closing down because of the SARS scare, Rubinoff is hoping to fill a gap in the local theatre scene. He says reasonably priced theatre can usually be found only in the suburbs.

He says he hopes to remove some of the costly sets and sensationalism from the stage in exchange for audience-friendly ticket prices.

"You won't see flying helicopters or huge chandeliers in my shows," he says, "but you are going to see great singers singing great songs from great shows."

The son of a real estate lawyer and a social worker in Thornhill, Rubinoff was drawn to show business at an early age. As a child, he acted in numerous film and television productions, including a Disney-CBC co-production in 1988.

(He briefly resumed his acting career for Side by Side By Sondheim, in which he appeared as the narrator, but said he intends to remain behind the scenes and concentrate on producing and some directing in future.)

During law school, hours after writing an exam, Rubinoff hopped on a flight to Liverpool to see an original production of Blood Brothers, then met playwright Willy Russell backstage. He later staged the musical in London, Ont.

Rubinoff also discussed his theatrical plans with Sir Cameron Mackintosh, the famed producer of Les Miserables, Cats and other celebrated shows, whom he met in London. Rubinoff says both meetings left a permanent imprint on him.

Evita is Rubinoff's most ambitious project to date. The original Andrew Lloyd Webber-Tim Rice musical won seven Tony awards and was beloved by an earlier generation of theatregoers. It tells the story of Eva Peron, the revered, saintlike figure who wielded enormous wealth and power in Argentine politics, and whose signature song is the familiar Don't Cry For Me, Argentina.

"In Toronto you have a chance," he says, regarding his dream of luring the crowds with low prices and strong talent. "You have a chance as long as you don't get too ambitious and you keep your runs short, and you keep the production values in check so that people can afford to buy a ticket. It shouldn't burn a hole in their pockets."

For tickets to Evita, call 416-366-7723 or visit the Web site, www.stlc.com. For group discounts, call 416-497-0965.

In the final film, Golem: The Petrified Garden, Gitai puts the collapse of the Soviet Union under the microscope and makes it the subject of this film. The main character of the film, Daniel, is an art dealer who travels to Birobidzhan in Siberia and witnesses the aftermath of the downfall of the Communist system.

Facets has also released an Italian film called The Sky Is Falling. Set in Tuscany in 1944, it tells the story of an Italian woman and her Jewish German husband, who live in a grand villa and have taken in the orphaned children of the wife's sister. All seems safe and normal, until the Gemans decide to enter the home.

All of these unusual films are now available directly from Facets at www.facets.org or as follows: Facets Multi-Media Inc., 1517 West Fullerton Avenue, Chicago, Illinois, 60614. Telephone: (773) 281-9075 Fax: (773) 929-5437 e-mail: sales@facets.org

Thornhill teen hopes for shot at NCAA school

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Josh Lipsey will be looking to make an impression over the next few weeks when he participates in a basketball summer league at Irvine Valley College in California.

It gives the 19-year-old Thornhill resident an opportunity to showcase his skills in front of a number of NCAA Division One coaches, and he hopes one will recruit him for a spot on their school's roster.

While he has already given Irvine Valley coach Jerry Hernandez a commitment for the fall, Lipsey said he would really like to get into a four-year school. For the time being, he's enrolled in the two-year kinesiology program at Irvine.

Lipsey is back home after a year at Vermont Academy, where he got an education both on and off the court. He completed grade 12 at the college preparatory boarding school, improving his SAT score to the NCAA qualifying level, while also getting himself noticed by American schools thanks to his stellar play.

"I did a lot better academically and learned how to manage my priorities," he said. "At Vaughan [Secondary School in Thornhill the year before], I would play basketball, go hang out with friends, and homework didn't come into mind a lot."

The six-foot-two, 195-pound point guard was Vermont's team MVP, averaging 20 points per game while leading the school to a five-win improvement over the previous season.

Lipsey said the guys down south played a lot harder, were a lot bigger and more athletic than in Canada. To keep up with the stiff competition, he would get up at 6 a.m. to lift weights or do agility drills .

Lipsey is hopeful he can make a career out of basketball after he finishes college.

"My major goal is to play professionally in Israel or somewhere in Europe," he said.

The honour roll student is a small forward on his high school basketball team, he plays for the school volleyball squad, he's a bronze medallion swimmer and in his younger days, he dabbled in soccer.

This past season, he was recognized as Thornhill Secondary School's "junior male athlete" of the year, as well as the basketball team's MVP.

Not too shabby, especially when you consider those sports take a back seat to his real passion, baseball.

Valentine has always loved baseball – particularly the strategic aspects of the game, the intricate interplay between players, their positioning on the diamond, the way a given situation makes you think.

As pitcher/third baseman for the Team Ontario Sophomores, the highest level provincial team for his age group, Valentine, 16, gets to experience strategic baseball at its best.

Not only does the team compete with other top clubs from southern Ontario in the CEBC (Canadian Elite Baseball Conference), the team is also on the road throughout the summer, barnstorming U.S. tournaments and taking on tough American competition.

It takes Ontario's best to compete against American teams, which seem to be blessed with good hitters and pitchers who throw the ball about 10 m.p.h. faster than Canadians do, Valentine said.

With his own fastball in the 83-84 m.p.h. range, Valentine should be able to hold his own against the big American bats.

So far this season in the CEBC, his ERA over 27 innings is 1.57 with 29 strike outs – one of the better stats among starters – and he's batting .318, which is fair to middling on a team with several players hitting in the .400 range and many others in the mid-.300s.

At 6-1, 200 lbs. – and still growing – Valentine has the size to generate pitching speed. Three-quarters of the pitches he throws are fastballs, with the rest more or less equally divided between curves and change-ups, depending on the batter. Although he's developed his own unique style, when pressed, he admits that he most admires former Toronto Blue Jays hurler Roger Clemens. When Clemens played for the Jays, Valentine never missed a game."He's overpowering," he said. "A very intelligent pitcher."

Valentine will need to have his best stuff ready when Team Ontario ventures to the U.S. Deep South in early August for the East Cobb CABA World Series in Marietta, Ga.

"It's the biggest thing we do," said Valentine. Some of the best teams from the American South are invited – along with Team Ontario. Prior to that, the Ontarios will play in the Welland (Ont.) Rawlings Canadian Classic and afterwards in the Indiana Bulls Brickyard Classic in Indiana.

The U.S. tournaments should provide a real test of just how good Valentine and his teammates are, said Team Ontario head coach Mark Picard. The American players are used to good pitching and the stuff Canadian pitchers can get away with north of the border, such as fastballs in the middle of the strike zone when behind the batter, will cost them dearly in the United States, he said.

The U.S. tournament will be a good learning experience and Picard expects his players to experience "some rough spots" this summer. It's how they respond to that adversity after being so dominant at home that could well determine whether they advance to the next level of U.S. college ball, he said.

Since being with the club, Picard said, Valentine has improved his work ethic, has been willing to learn and has worked hard on getting better placement of his pitches within the strike zone.

"He's one of our top three or four pitchers and he gets a lot of work starting and coming out of the bullpen" as a closer, Picard said.

Between games and practices, Valentine's summer is pretty busy, but he's leaving room for yet another trip south of the border in late August, when he'll rejoin the Toronto Maccabi junior baseball squad in Tenafly, N.J. The team will be trying to improve on last summer's silver-medal performance.

For Valentine, it will be his third time suiting up for the Maccabi team. Two years ago in Philadelphia, the boys finished fifth, while last year in Montreal they got to the final before losing to a good Los Angeles team in a blowout on a blustery, rainy day.

Maccabi coach Howard Kideckel knows he's getting a blue-chip pitcher in Valentine. "He's going to be my ace this year down in New Jersey," Kideckel said.

He plans to start Valentine in the opener and the semi-final – that is, if the team gets that far.

On other occasions, Valentine will likely play at third base. "He has a gun of an arm," Kideckel said. "He throws it from third base to first base on a line, with no arc at all."

Kideckel also expects to make good use of Valentine's bat. Three years ago, when Valentine was the youngest player on the team, he was already designated cleanup hitter, the coach recalled.

What's more, "he's an exceptional kid. He's a superstar, but he doesn't act like a superstar," Kideckel said.

What about inter-dating?

By JODI KOVITZ

My parents' divorce gave me a total of five siblings and two wonderful families that celebrate both Chanukah and Christmas every year. Given that I was born a Jew, and that I lead a fairly modern-day Reform Jewish life, you might be surprised to know that in fact I love everything about Christmas. For those of you who have never tried it, I won't lie. Decorating a Christmas tree and opening a mountain of presents is almost as fun as searching for the afikoman at Pesach.

While I was open to celebrating non-Jewish holidays with my family, and have many fond memories of those times, I have never questioned my own Judaism. I think my connection to Judaism is so strong, even with the presence of intermarriage in half of my family, in part because I saw intermarriage from a distance (my father married a non-Jew). I actually grew up with my mother and stepfather in a Jewish home. My Jewish identity may have been entirely different had I grown up in a home with my parents practising two different religions.

The issue of intermarriage is not new. Many famous authors have explored what factors lie at the root of the supposed "intermarriage problem," and have attempted to explain why it is such an urgent issue that needs fixing. I will leave that discussion to the experts.

From a 20-something perspective, the issue is a little different. Deciding whether or not to date non-Jews presents a host of questions. What is love? Is it based on choice? Are we restricting ourselves if we limit our selection to Jewish people? Is marrying someone Jewish important to us as individuals, or do we only want to marry Jewish to please our parents?

What if Bill, who sits next to you every day in your MBA class, isn't Jewish but makes you laugh? You become close friends, and consider taking it to the next level. But wait – Bill isn't Jewish. What do you do?

For those of us who have made the decision for ourselves that we will only date people who are Jewish, there is certainly a great solution – J-Date. Although many of us say we would rather not be caught dead on the J-Date Web site, most of the people I know are using it. How else, except through friends, can you meet people in their 20s who are Jewish, have good Jewish values and come from nice Jewish families?

But what solutions are there for those of us who might be affiliated with Judaism in some way, but who are not sure about dating only Jews? What about those of us who are unaffiliated (and are, in fact, adamantly against affiliation), but whose parents would freak out if we were to bring home a non-Jewish partner? What about those of us who always thought we would only date someone Jewish, but happen to fall in love with someone Catholic who is unwilling to convert?

One reader recently wrote to me, "I dated non-Jewish girls in high school and at university, but though I had some passionate relationships, something was missing with them."

He continued, "As unaffiliated as I was with Judaism religiously, I knew deep down inside I could never marry outside my culture."

This is such a difficult issue that I don't even know what I would do personally if I found myself in such a position. When we face these types of decisions, the best we can do is take the pressure off by not trying to please anyone but ourselves. I welcome your insight and feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Three stories about the humble kippah:

• While working for the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), I was travelling with a colleague in Russia soon after the collapse of communism. David was a retired Israeli educator who had risen to the top of the bureaucracy at the Ministry of Education. Born in Vilna, educated in an Orthodox setting before the war, David had made aliyah, moved to a kibbutz and was now a secular Jew who had lived most of his life in Israel.

David is a giant of a Jewish educator with vast experience and knowledge in both pedagogics and Judaica. We were working with Russian Jews who had recently become aware of their Jewishness, some of whom were fast becoming Jewish educators. One of them entered a room in a battered synagogue where we were meeting and put on a kippah. David's response was one of cynicism, thinking that our new friend had donned the kippah to impress us, mistaking us as representatives of some religious organization. My Diaspora perspective permitted me a more generous interpretation.

• I was working in a Toronto day school and attended the school's staff orientation in August. The principal spoke proudly of the fact that every boy in the school was expected to turn up each day with a kippah in his pocket. He wanted the teachers to know and enforce this rule. A brand new Israeli teacher just off the plane innocently asked: "Wouldn't it be better on his head?"

• A veteran statesman of the Jewish people and my former boss at JDC, Ralph Goldman, was speaking at a fundraising dinner in a New York hotel. Since the sponsoring organization was Orthodox, kippot were handed out at the door. When Ralph rose to speak, his new kippah kept falling off his head. He quickly replaced it with one from his pocket, and said: "It fits better when it's your own!"

The expression in Hebrew is, "Ha-ma'ivin yavin!" If you need that translated, ask a friend…

Health care workers saluted at annual general meeting

Ontario health care workers deserve thanks for their vigilance, dedication and perseverance during the SARS outbreak. This was the message that Ontario Premier Ernie Eves and Minister of Health and Long-Term Care, Tony Clement brought to an audience of more than 200 members of Mount Sinai's community on Monday, June 16th. The occasion was the joint Annual General Meeting for Mount Sinai Hospital and the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation. The Premier and the Minister were special guests. They both commended Mount Sinai Hospital for its leadership, not only during the SARS outbreak but also in the provision of the best patient care, teaching, and research. Microbiologist-in-Chief, Dr. Don Low, was presented a plaque for his work in the SARS outbreak - which he accepted on behalf of all Mount Sinai health care workers. Calling the outbreak "an incredible experience" and referring to the risks faced by health care workers he said, "Nobody should have to test themselves under such difficult challenges."

Mount Sinai President and CEO Joseph Mapa and Chair of the Board Lawrence Bloomberg spoke about the Hospital's key achievements of the past year: the opening of leading-edge patient care and research centres at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Building on Murray Street; a governance review to optimize operations; and the attainment of full accreditation from the Canadian Council on Health Services Accreditation.

After a brief welcome from Joseph Mapa, President and CEO of Mount Sinai, the 10K race was off and running - led by Lawrence Bloomberg, Chairman of the Board, Mount Sinai Hospital and Michael Bregman, Chairman of the Board, Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation.

After the start of the 10K, Joseph Mapa then welcomed the 5K runners and walkers and the 5K was quickly underway led by Nicholas Offord, President, Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation.

While race participants crossed over the finish line, various mascots such as Carlton the Bear, mascot for the Maple Leafs, Barbie and Yogi the Bear wandered the park entertaining the kids while their parents enjoyed the food tent and music. Kids also had the opportunity to have fun in the Scotiabank Kids Tent where they could paint their own t-shirt and have their faces painted.

12 Liberal MPs, senators urge shift in Mideast policy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A dozen Liberal MPs and senators are asking the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) to "improve and refresh" its Mideast policy – in effect shifting to a more pro-Israel stance.

In a paper submitted to the department as part of its comprehensive review of foreign policy, the MPs advance a broad range of recommendations that would see Canada recognize Israel's legitimate need to fight terrorism, marginalize Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, end its use of the term "cycle of violence," and alter Canada's voting pattern on United Nations resolutions that single out Israel for criticism.

MP Joe Volpe

MP Art Eggleton

If adopted, the report suggests its recommendations would add "a number of corrections... in the current Canadian foreign policy towards the conflict... [by] bringing our policy up to date and resolving the inconsistencies between our stated policy and our implementation of that policy."

The policy paper states it "offers a comprehensive vision of proactive, Canadian Middle Eastern diplomacy in the 21st century and it gives hope to this region in turmoil."

The policy proposals were submitted by Toronto-area MPs Carolyn Bennett, Art Eggleton, Jim Peterson and Joe Volpe; Montreal-area MPs Raymonde Folco, Marlene Jennings, Bernard Patry, Irwin Cotler and Senator Leo Kolber; Winnipeg MP Anita Neville and Winnipeg Senator Richard Kroft; and Vancouver Senator Jack Austin.

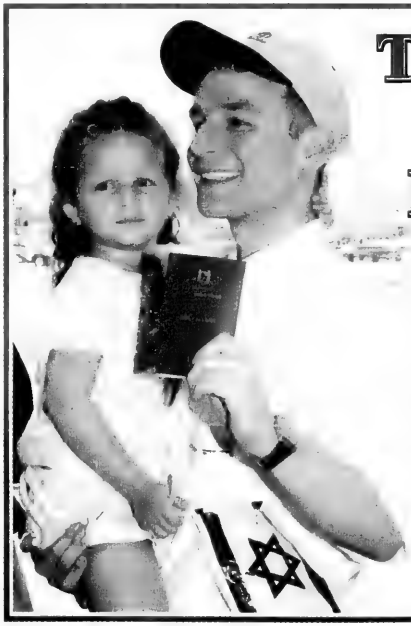
The move of a lifetime



Nearly 1,000 North American Jews will realize their dream of making aliyah this summer with the help of Nefesh B'Nefesh, a U.S.-based organization that financially aids families wishing to immigrate to Israel. The first 500 olim arrived in Tel Aviv last Tuesday and were welcomed by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Sallai Meridor, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Abella Wins Award

TORONTO — Ontario Court of Appeal Judge Rosalie Abella was announced last week as the co-winner of an international prize for her contribution to breaking "barriers limiting women's participation in the legal system." She shares the $200,000 Justice Prize of the Peter Guber Foundation with retired judge Bertha Wilson, the first woman appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada. The foundation is based in the U.S. Virgin Islands and is named for U.S. hedge fund manager Peter Gruber. Abella, 57, became Ontario's first Jewish woman judge in 1976 and headed a 1984 federal royal commission on equality in employment.

Tikkun Olam Mission

TORONTO — A group of Canadian professionals with expertise in street outreach and youth in distress completed a 10-day exchange program in Israel earlier this week. They were sent by Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee and while in Israel worked closely with Elem, an organization that works with street youth. The trip was to include visits to coffee shop counselling centres in Acco, Tel Aviv and Ramle, as well as working with youth in Jerusalem and discussions on poverty, volunteerism, addiction and counselling at Tel Aviv University.

ISRAEL

Foreign Enrolment Up

JERUSALEM — Overseas applications are up at Israeli universities. Tel Aviv University said it has already accepted more than three times as many students as last year into an English-language graduate studies program, Ha'aretz reported. The report said that applications to master's programs for overseas university students at Hebrew University in Jerusalem are also returning to pre-intifadah levels. Before the latest intifadah, some 340 students were enrolled in the programs through the Rothberg International School for Overseas Students, the report said.

WORLD

Troy Appointed

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Bush administration has named domestic policy adviser Tevi Troy, brother of McGill University professor and new CJN columnist Gil Troy, as its new liaison to the Jewish community. Tevi Troy was a policy director for U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft when Ashcroft was a senator from Missouri and publicly defended him against criticism from Jewish leaders during Ashcroft's confirmation hearings for the attorney general post in 2001. Troy will retain his domestic policy portfolio. He replaces Adam Goldman, who earlier announced he was leaving for the private sector.

Tel Aviv Honoured

NEW YORK — Tel Aviv's "White City" architecture and Prague's Jewish Quarter have been designated as world heritage sites by UNESCO. The two Jewish sites were among 24 added earlier this month to UNESCO's list, which now includes 754 entries. Tel Aviv was recognized for its white, Bauhaus-style architecture.

Irving Film to be Shown

MELBOURNE — An Australian tribunal refused to block the screening of a 1993 film made by Holocaust denier David Irving. The president of the Jewish Community Council of Victoria, Michael Lipshutz, asked the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal to grant an injunction to prevent the screening of the film at the Melbourne Underground Film Festival last week. Irving made the movie The Search for the Truth in History after a decision by the Australian government banning the Briton from entering the country. The film is believed to be the speech he intended to make at that time.

Mass Aliyah

NEW YORK — Some 500 North Americans making aliyah arrived in Israel last week, where they were welcomed by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Sallai Meridor, head of the Jewish Agency for Israel, which handles immigrant absorption. A second flight with 350 North Americans olim is to leave later this month. As well as an absorption package worth several thousand dollars that each immigrant will get from the Israeli government, many are receiving financial aid from Nefesh B'Nefesh, a private Florida-based group.

Jewish Leader Resigns Over Drug Charges

BERLIN — German Jewish leaders are supporting Michel Friedman, one of Germany's most prominent Jewish officials, after he announced he will pay a fine to close a cocaine possession investigation and will leave public life.

He "showed a certain human greatness" in his handling of the situation, said Salomon Korn, head of the Jewish community in Frankfurt, after Friedman's news conference last week, where he accepted the charges against him and said he is giving up his public posts. He also asked forgiveness from the public, his colleagues and his girlfriend.

As well as hosting two TV shows on public affairs, Friedman, 47, served as vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany and president of the European Jewish Congress. He has agreed to pay a $19,000 (US) fine for 10 counts of cocaine possession.

Korn said Friedman has not damaged the German Jewish community's reputation.

The news of Friedman's transgressions broke June 11, when, prompted by testimony from two prostitutes in an unrelated court trial, police raided his Frankfurt home and law office, confiscating evidence they say turned out to be cocaine. Hair tests confirmed Friedman's use of the drug, police said.

Same-sex marriage ruling recognizes diversity: activist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Joanne Cohen predicts that some day, same-sex marriages will become as common as the bat mitzvah.

"Whereas the bat mitzvah used to be viewed as a scandal, it is now ubiquitous across Jewish life," says the first openly gay representative to Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

First openly gay rep to Congress speaks out

The co-ordinator of the Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same Sex Marriage, comprised of 25 Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis across Canada, Cohen, 40, is a published author whose recent chapter in the book Queer Jews, edited by David Shneer and Caryn Aviv, was recently nominated for a Lambda Literary Award for gay and lesbian writing. She is currently working on her PhD at York University, focusing on theories of law and society.

She applauds the governments of British Columbia and Ontario for recently endorsing the right for gay and lesbian couples to marry, and says it was she who brought the B.C. case to the attention of the rabbis' coalition in 2002.

"As the daughter of a Holocaust survivor, I was particularly alarmed to see the length to which the moral majority would go to fight same-sex secular marriage."

She arranged a meeting with the Greater Toronto Association of Reform Rabbis and convinced them to form an intervener group to present arguments in the B.C. and Ontario court cases.

She then applied for and obtained a $35,000 grant from the Court Challenges Program, a national non-profit organization set up in 1994 to provide financial assistance for court cases that advance language and equality rights guaranteed under Canada's Constitution, and went on to gain permission to present the rabbinic coalition's arguments to the courts.

The rabbis argued that they recognize the diversity of opinion on the issue of same-sex marriages, and that they support the right for clergy to choose whether or not to perform them, says Cohen.

"Recognizing that there is a choice does not force anyone to perform same-sex marriages," she says.

Joanne Cohen

The coalition believes the religious freedoms and equality rights of the clergy were impeded by the continued prohibition of same-sex marriage, says Cohen.

In the Ontario court case, the coalition's lawyer, Ed Morgan, a professor of international law and human rights at University of Toronto, argued that support of gay and lesbian families helps to strengthen the Jewish family in its diversity, and allows all community members to participate in the committed and loving relationships fostered by the Jewish faith.

"We received a judgement that was hands down," says Cohen.

The real importance of the case, says Cohen, who took more than a year off from her studies to prepare for it, is that "we are recognizing diversities at a time when the community needs to come together. It is only a matter of time, she says, before changes in secular society lead to changes in religious communities."

There is no justification for people's efforts to argue against the equal rights of gays and lesbians, she says. "We need to have respectful discussion, and provide education on this issue."

The challenge, Cohen says, is to overcome thousands of years of repudiation. "We are still dealing with catching up, but we are making progress. It has been an exciting time.

"I'm delighted and exhausted, and I wish the fights were not necessary, because we should not have to fight for our right to exist. I am honoured and humbled to be part of this change."

Rhapsodic recollections

From the editor's desk

Recently in this space, I wrote about a small anthology of writing by and about the noted Israeli author Aharon Appelfeld, entitled, appropriately, Encounter with Aharon Appelfeld.

One of Appelfeld's most penetrating insights in the book concerned the way children, as opposed to adults, internalized the experience of the Holocaust.

"Children did not absorb the full horror, only that portion of it which children could take in," Appelfeld writes.

"Children lack a sense of chronology or of comparison with the past…

"Now we have a body of testimonies, oral and written, by child survivors, and they are different from the testimonies of the grown ups. Their testimony is closer to literature…

"[I]t was from them [the children] in the course of time that artistic expression arose."

For Solo Violin: A Jewish Childhood in Fascist Italy, A Memoir by Aldo Zargani, (Paul Dry Books, 2002) is one such recently published artistic expression. Beautifully written, powerful, Zargani's work is a spellbinding testament to the wisdom of Appelfeld's observations. Translated from the Italian Per violino solo by Marina Harss, Zargani's memoir is a veritable rhapsody of recollections.

Zargani skillfully integrates history, custom, lore and theology with memories and observations he recalled through the wide-eyed vulnerability of his childhood.

His personal story before and during the war, of course, is also the story of Italian Jewry.

During World War II, some 7,500 Italian Jews were killed; approximately 28,000 Jews survived.

The fascist regime of Benito Mussolini enacted racial laws that discriminated against Jews, but Italy's entry into the war occasioned no physical threat to the security of the country's Jewish community. Although about 200 Jews were interned in concentration camps established by the Italian government along with several thousand Jews of foreign nationalities, there were no deportations to death camps nor any of the mass executions that were staining the villages and forests of eastern Europe dark red. By and large, the Italian people did not accommodate or co-operate with the annihilation of Jews.

The organized, methodical round-up, deportation and killing of Italian Jews did not begin until the summer of 1943 when the Mussolini government fell and surrendered to the advancing Allies. Italy was essentially cut in half. The Allies controlled the south; the Nazis controlled the centre and the north. It was only then that the Jews of Italy became as the Jews of eastern Europe – despised, hunted and murdered.

Zargani's memoir of their survival, written more than a half century later, is a rich, poetic, deeply moving pastiche of cinematic-quality scenes. He introduces us to the colourful members of his family, to the many "ordinary," brave Italians whose resistance to the Nazis made the author's survival possible, and to the fabled northern Italian countryside whose sylvan landscape was as sheltering a sanctuary as were the generous individuals they met along the harrowing way.

Zargani is a gifted writer. His use of imagery is magical and he is able to develop a concept and expand upon it in multi-layered nuances. For example, Zargani recalls one of his schoolteachers in the following few words: "Miss Amar was an armoire from the shoulders to the hips, an armoire in a black dress from which emerged two, normal feminine legs."

As relief against the many remarkably portrayed, but inevitably sad details of the story, Zargani constantly relies upon his wry, deft sense of humour.

He describes an encounter with a troublesome, even dangerous playmate: "This child, who, like me, was eight or nine years old, was living proof of the power of DNA: he was perfidious, insinuating, pornographic, fascist and anti-Semitic. Just like his father. Thin, pale, neurotic, and elegant, he asked me one day, with a snakelike air, staring with his green eyes into my own and shaking bifurcated tongue, "Do you know where you people are circumcised?" And I answered, "Of course I know. In the lower back."

Episode by episode, with razor-sharp insight and achingly evocative descriptions, Zargani recalls the harrowing but ultimately redemptive passage of his family through those terrible war years. The tender core of that passage is the author's loving recall of his father, a concert violinist who was stripped of his career by the fascists and who strove with guts, guile and luck to keep his family safe from the ubiquitously encroaching evil.

Per violino solo was first published in Italy in 1995 and won several literary awards. It is an endearing testament to Appelfeld's acute assertion regarding the literature that is now emerging from children who survived the Holocaust. It is a wonderful book.

Secular/haredi tensions in Israel will ease: author

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is embroiled in a cultural war pitting secular Jews against haredim, but in a generation this struggle will ease, says the Israeli author of a new book on the subject.

Noah Efron

Noah Efron, a professor of history and philosophy at Bar Ilan University, writes that the vast majority of secular Jews hate haredim because they are blatantly trying to shape the fundamental character of the state.

And they are pushing for these changes even though they constitute a small proportion of the population.

"One of the few values shared by most secular Jews in Israel is rage aimed at the ultra-Orthodox," he observes in Real Jews, published by HarperCollins Canada.

In an interview to promote his book, Efron said the success the Shinui political party enjoyed in the last Israeli general election is symptomatic of the widespread discontent haredim have engendered in the country.

The anti-clerical party's leader, Joseph (Tommy) Lapid, harped on the theme that haredim had to be beaten back.

One in seven Israeli voters bought his argument and Shinui won 15 seats, making it the third largest party in the Knesset, said Efron, a 42-year-old modern Orthodox Jew and American who has lived in Israel for the past 20 years.

In his estimation, Lapid touched a raw nerve. "He was electrifying. People would clap and cheer."

Despite his downbeat assessment of the abysmal state of relations between secular and very religious Jews, Efron sees a ray of hope in the future.

"A generation from now, the tension will be much less severe. Haredim are becoming acculturated into secular Israeli society."

Citing a recent example, he referred to the landslide victory of a haredi candidate in Jerusalem's last mayoralty election. The victor, Uri Lupoliansky, promised to work on behalf of all the city's residents.

Still, Efron pointed out, haredim are often their own worst enemies.

"They have forced [taxpayers] to pay the bills for their values, which is unacceptable and untenable," he said, referring to haredi demands for financial assistance for their institutions and schools.

Efron, who describes himself as a liberal, said he expects Lapid, the justice minister, to modify the agreement that governs Israel's relations with the haredi community.

According to Efron, Lapid intends to pass legislation that will require haredi men to serve in the army or perform national service, eliminate the principle of preferential funding and remove haredi influence in such civil matters as marriage and divorce.

Efron rates his chances of achieving these objectives as good. "He will partially succeed."

The anemic state of Israel's economy is also working against the haredim, he noted, saying that Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has already cut child-care and yeshiva subsidies.

Efron suggested that the haredi community, which has a high birth rate and forms about 10 per cent of Israel's Jewish population, is generally misunderstood.

Through their political parties, haredim wield greater power than their numbers warrant. Yet they are less powerful than they are perceived.

"They are heartbroken at how little power they have," said Efron, whose late grandparents lived in the haredi enclave of Bnei Brak, near Tel Aviv.

Jacob's Ladder seeks to raise awareness of disease

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Six-year-old Jacob Schwartz was born with Canavan disease, a rare, fatal, genetic condition that causes progressive mental and physical disabilities. There is no cure.

Children affected with Canavan disease are unable to sit, crawl, walk, eat or even speak. It is unlikely that Jacob will live past his 10th year.

Despite the difficulties they face, Jacob's parents, Ellen and Jeff Schwartz, created the organization Jacob's Ladder: The Foundation for Control of Neurodegenerative Disease, which has raised more than $600,000 in less than five years to advance the research into neurodegenerative diseases.

Jacob's Ladder is holding its first annual Family Fun Day fundraiser at Ontario Place on Sunday, July 27, 10:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

The Fun Day events will include clowns, magicians, jugglers, carnival games and many other special prizes and treats.

Among the featured guest artists will be children's entertainers Jack Grunsky, Kayla and Ralph the dog, The Stylamanders, Craig Douglas, The Travellers and others. "It's like a mini Woodstock for kids," Ellen said.

The foundation helps fund research at The Hospital for Sick Children, which the Schwartzes hope will lead to a treatment and a cure for Canavan disease. They have also broadened the mandate to provide funding to try to find a cure for other neurodegenerative diseases, including Tay Sachs, Familial Dysautonomia, Alzheimer's, Epilepsy, Parkinson's, Huntington's.

In an interview, his parents described Jacob as "a happy, gentle child." He requires ongoing, round-the-clock care.

"Jacob is a true miracle," Jeff said. "Although he cannot do more than recline and smile, he is bright-eyed and enjoys listening to music, swimming and playing. He is truly a joy to be with."

Jeff (above) and Ellen (at right) created Jacob's Ladder after their son was diagnosed with Canavan's Disease.

Ellen, a day school teacher and Jeff, a business entrepreneur are trying to help all those affected by these diseases. They said Jacob's Ladder has already achieved a critical goal in the area of disease prevention by introducing prenatal genetic screening.

"As a direct result of the initiatives taken and funds raised by Jacob's Ladder," Ellen said, "anyone at risk in Ontario can now be screened for Canavan disease at no cost, and we hope this will be available across Canada before long, which is a major step towards disease prevention."

Jeff explains that the three main goals of Jacob's Ladder are to make genetic screening available to at-risk population at no cost, to increase funding for research into therapies and potential cures, and to make the public more aware of this rare and devastating disease.

The funds raised also provide an international research prize for innovative research in neurodegenerative diseases. The recipient of the award presents his research to physicians from around Ontario at The Hospital for Sick Children.

Canavan disease affects parents of Ashkenazi families. Both parents contribute a defective gene to their child. Jeff and Ellen have two other healthy children, Beverly, 4, and Benjamin, six months old.

"Jacob is an inspiration to us because he is so disabled yet he enjoys his life more than anyone else. The journey we have taken has created stress and disappointment, but we are grateful that it has provided a positive contribution to help others in the future.

"We know it won't end up happy, but we enjoy every day with Jacob."

Tickets for the Jacob's Ladder Family Fun Day are $20, which includes access to Ontario Place. It is free for children under three. Tickets must be bought in advance by calling 416-597-5497 or visiting the Web site, www.jacobsladder.ca.

Community challenged to live up to ideals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Earlier this spring, during the Shavuot holiday, Ilana Etienne delved into the writings of the Kotzker rebbe, a 19th century Polish sage renowned for his vast body of knowledge.

Reading about the rebbe, she was struck by the high expectations he had of people and how there was something in the way he saw others that seemed kind of familiar.

She soon realized, "I'm a little Kotzker-ish in my views of how Jews should behave."

As Etienne gazes out on the Jewish community in Toronto, her Kotzker-ish nature emerges and she instinctively challenges the community to live up to its ideals and professed values. She asks, "who are you inviting in?" On what basis do you think Jews should all resemble the European stock which forms the majority of the local Jewish community?

Like the colourful artwork she paints and the Creole cooking that is her specialty, Etienne is also a mix of heritages and colours, but in the end, she's 100 per cent Jewish. Still, she knows that when other Jews see her for the first time, they're apt to assume she's not. "If I walk into a shul with a blonde, blue-eyed girl, people think she's the Jew and I'm not," Etienne said. "People are surprised that a Jew can be like me, 100 per cent kosher to the bone."

Ilana Etienne

A native of Moncton, N.B., Etienne is the daughter of Gerard Etienne, a Haitian-born author of 23 novels, and Netanya Feuerwerker, the daughter of a rabbi.

Being both Jewish and black, Etienne believes, enhances both experiences. "It's being more of something and that makes everything I experience in Judaism more intense. It's almost like knowing an extra language.

"Being black gives me an in into a world. It's music, art, dance, science. I'm seeing it from a different perspective. It's in my DNA.

"Because I have this black gene within me, I know that Jews in Europe were packed up because they were different."

Straddling both worlds, Etienne believes she possesses particular insights on assimilation, personal identity and acceptance.

The Jewish community in Toronto, she said, is in danger of adopting the way of thinking of the majority culture, and that can only lead to assimilation. This "homesteader culture," which views latecomers to the city as not really Canadian, ignores the fact that "Jews around the world are ethnic-looking people," she said.

She's experienced that attitude in her own life, where she finds that "in Toronto, people don't realize that mixed marriages are possible. They're stunned to hear that black Jews exist...I explain to people that God doesn't have a colour."

Etienne, who also goes by the nickname Mika, has a message for the Jewish community: to live up to its ideal of being a light unto the nations, Jews must disregard stereotypes they hold about each other.

During the Passover seder, she points out, your door must be opened and strangers allowed in. That's a fundamental precept of Judaism, she said.

Like other 20-somethings in Jewish Toronto, Etienne is interested in meeting her soulmate, but she finds the Jewish singles scene quite sad. "The same people who make stereotypes will do it regarding women, for their size or their salary," she said.

Moving to Toronto from Moncton, Etienne thought it would be easier to practice Judaism, remain pious and sanctify her home and family. Conservative by nature, Etienne sees too much idolatry in the lives of Jews – "with no God" in what they do.

In Moncton, life for her was sometimes difficult. Keeping kosher was always a challenge but more difficult was the kind of racism she experienced. "Being black was okay, being Jewish was not."

As an eight-year-old, she recalls, there were Nazi symbols and books in her school, which was where anti-Semitic author Malcolm Ross taught.

Here in Toronto, Etienne is working long hours in her brother Joel's law office. She's a popular speaker on black-Jewish relations and she feels she can serve as a role model for people in the Jewish community who might feel marginalized, like adopted children and agunot.

Often she'll refer to traditional Jewish texts, like the Book of Lamentations and Song of Songs, which she feels speak to the needs of Jewish women.

Song of Songs is particularly inspiring, she said. "In the love poetry the woman is so glorious, it's where women are at their best and that glory is given when a woman is respected, when a person finds it within to affirm themselves."

How you can use hypnosis to lose weight

DOES HYPNOSIS WORK?

YES! Last year many thousands of people turned to Positive Changes Hypnosis after trying everything else without success. That may be why so many were open to the idea of hypnosis.

HOW* DOES HYPNOSIS WORK?

If you're overweight, hypnosis allows your subconscious to make you think and act like a thin person; if you smoke, you'll think like a non-smoker; and if stress is a problem, you'll learn how to identify the source of the stress and cope with it without letting it dominate your life.

IS HYPNOSIS SAFE?

When people ask this question, they really mean, "How do I know you won't make me do things I don't want to do?" Most people get their image of hypnosis from old black and white movies or stage shows. That's not the way hypnosis works in the real world. We cannot make you do things against your will or reveal secrets. You hear and understand everything that happens and you remain in complete control. Positive Changes has been North America's leading hypnosis centre for over 30 years. All of our hypnotists are experts and are certified by the National Guild of Hypnotists, the American Board of Hypnotherapy, and the Society of Psycho-Linguistic Practitioners.

DO YOU HAVE TESTIMONIALS FROM OTHER CLIENTS?

Can you take a year off to read them all? Many are on file in our clinics and we would be proud to share them with you. Just ask. All testimonials are from clients who were more than happy to write to us about their success with Positive Changes.

The bully's rules: threats, blackmail

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas last week resigned from the Fatah central committee and threatened to resign as prime minister following a dispute with PA President Yasser Arafat and the Fatah ruling council over the way Abbas was conducting negotiations with Israel.

In partial response to Abbas' ultimatum, the Fatah central committee and various Arafat loyalists demanded that the powers of PA Security Affairs Minister Mohammad Dahlan be reduced. They further demanded that Dahlan's hold on the PA's interior ministry be relinquished and that all security matters be handled by the "national security council" that Arafat established after he appointed Abbas prime minister.

Last week, senior Hamas spokesperson Abdul Rantisi threatened to escalate violence against Israel unless the Jewish state released Hamas and Islamic Jihad prisoners being held in Israeli jails. Rantisi's threat followed by two days the suicide bombing by Islamic Jihad at Kfar Yavetz that killed 65-year-old Mazal Afari.

Hamas' spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, reinforced Rantisi's remarks by saying that Israel's unwillingness to release thousands of Palestinian prisoners could undermine the cease-fire and that Hamas' "patience has its limits."

On Thursday, Dahlan "urged" Israel to release thousands of Palestinian prisoners. He said this would be "vital" to bolster a shaky truce with those factions he called the "militants," such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Al Aqsa Martyrs and Tanzim.

Is it not so surreal as to be beyond belief that Israel is being asked to appease the very groups that are planning its demise? The logic is as absurd as the purposes are transparent. In order to bolster Abbas and Dahlan, the appeasers claim, Israel must comply with Hamas' blackmail. How Abbas will be able to assert more control over Hamas by actually strengthening Hamas' ranks is a mystery. How Abbas will be able to assert more control over Arafat by diminishing his own ability to rein in Hamas is a riddle.

How disappointing it is then, that the United States has joined those groups urging Israel's acquiescence to the "militants' demands.

U.S. special Mideast envoy John Wolf last week, among other things, called upon Israel to release more than the 320 Palestinian prisoners the cabinet recently approved. In response, Israel announced it would likely add some Hamas and Islamic Jihad members to the original figure, but only those not involved in the killing of Israelis.

Unfortunately, because of the interwoven intricacies of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Israel is unavoidably swept up in the opacity of Palestinian politics. But Israel must not be expected, let alone forced, to submit to the bullying that is one of the chief hallmarks of those politics.

Gratified by praise of Mulroney

It was a pleasure to read Morton Weinfeld's column on former Canadian prime minister Brian Mulroney ("The best prime minister – for the Jews," CJN, June 26). I can endorse his evaluation of Mulroney as "good for the Jews" from personal experience.

I first met Mulroney when he was leader of the Opposition. Canadian Jewish Congress executive vice-president Alan Rose and I went to see him about the problem of Nazi war criminals who had been living in Canada since the war.

His intense response surprised us. He told us he considered the war crimes question a deep moral issue and offered to raise it in the House of Commons if we did not get satisfaction from the Trudeau government. He also promised to deal with this issue if he became prime minister.

I must admit I didn't pay much attention to his promise. Promises by Opposition leaders are easy to give but difficult to honour once they achieve power. Joe Clark's promise to move the Israeli embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem was still fresh in my mind.

The next day, I got what I considered to be a satisfactory commitment from the Minister of Justice, so we never tested Mulroney's offer to raise the question in the House.

Unfortunately, the Liberal government dragged its feet and ended up doing nothing. When the Mulroney government set up a royal commission in 1984 to inquire into the presence of Nazi war criminals in Canada and to recommend measures to the government to deal with the problem, inter-ministerial correspondence was tabled, and we learned that the Liberal government had not been telling me the truth. In fact, they had decided to do nothing.

But after Mulroney became prime minister, he delivered on his promise to Rose and myself to an extent I could not have believed possible.

First of all, he appointed the royal commission without putting the question to Cabinet. Justice Jules Deschenes of Quebec was appointed to lead it.

Then his government made an astounding decision – it accepted Deschenes' recommendation to amend Canada's Criminal Code to allow prosecution of war criminals in our courts for crimes committed outside of Canada. We were the first country after Germany to amend its criminal law in this way.

Unfortunately, this initiative was frustrated by government bureaucracy, with the result that there have been no convictions under this section of the Code.

Other than the many Jews who were close to Mulroney, the Jewish public has not been aware of the high regard – even affection – he has had for our community.

So it is very gratifying to read Weinfeld's excellent comments in response to Mulroney's two recent speeches on anti-Semitism and Israel. It's about time we took public steps to rectify the historical record to honour one of our greatest friends in Canadian political life.

Response to Shainhouse 1

I read with amazement David Shainhouse's letter to the editor ("Tuition fees unavoidable," CJN, July 3). Shainhouse's analysis of the high cost of Jewish education at Associated Hebrew Schools is based almost entirely upon a dispassionate perception of reality. Contrary to Shainhouse's "viewpoint," a quantitative analysis of Associated's financial assistance files clearly dispels the notion that "subsidies are offered, but only for parents willing to beg for funds." The fact is that more than 70 per cent of applications for financial assistance are approved based solely on fulfilling the reporting requirements and the criteria set out by the Board of Jewish Education/UJA Federation, without the necessity of conducting an interview.

The allegation of "waiting until now to advise parents of the shortfall... (in community funding)...," is inconsistent with the fact that Associated's financial statements have been presented and approved at the annual general meeting of the corporation for decades.

While Shainhouse's point related to new programs introduced in the last six years at a substantial cost is well taken, the fact is virtually every new initiative implemented by the school was a result of a strategic plan approved by the board of directors based on input from dozens of focus groups made up of literally hundreds of parents, as well as other strategic partners.

Everyone who accepts the importance of Jewish literacy through formal Jewish education laments the fact that the cost of Jewish education has risen precipitously over the last decade. The notion that Associated should be exempt from underlying environmental forces (for example, uniform collective agreements with bargaining groups) that critically affect tuition increases throughout the day school system in Toronto and elsewhere is wishful thinking.

Shainhouse begins his letter by saying that "insults and old clichés (attributed to Associated's president Sheldon Carr) will not make the situation any better." Our conclusion: neither will unresearched allegations.

As co-chairs of the Associated Hebrew Schools tuition committee we are sorry to see misinformation being spread in David Shainhouse's letter about parents who receive subsidies not being asked to make sacrifices, while those who pay the full fee must forego vacations, summer camps and planning for retirement. This is simply false.

The inference that those receiving financial assistance are getting away with living a comfortable lifestyle without sacrificing the very things that Shainhouse lists is a dangerous canard that pits one group of parents against another without any knowledge of the facts. All applicants for assistance are asked to make sacrifices within strict guidelines prepared by the Board of Jewish Education and the sacrifices of all Jewish parents in sending their children to day schools should be equally recognized.

A year to remember

By MINNA F. WOLF

Despite the 2½-year crisis in Israel, which has dramatically reduced the number of tourists to the Jewish state, many young adults continue to enrol in year-long educational programs there.

Students who came to Israel during the 2001-2002 school year encountered one of the worst periods in the young state's recent history, marked by an increase in the number and intensity of suicide bombings. The situation hit its low point during Pesach, when Jerusalem, normally full of holiday visitors, turned into a ghost town. Yet the majority of students on year-long programs completed their studies. Who were the students who arrived in Israel when many of their peers chose to opt out? What structures were in place to help them survive emotionally during the more difficult times of terror and complete their programs?

'Five factors helped participants remain and complete their programs in Israel'

As part of an effort to answer these questions, the research and development unit of the department of Jewish Zionist education of the Jewish Agency commissioned Sharon Kangisser Cohen and me, both doctoral students at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, to conduct a study on North American students in Israel during the 2001-2002 school year. We interviewed directors and students of four different programs: Project Otzma, Hebrew Union College, Young Judaea's year course and Midreshet Lindenbaum. The participants came to Israel for ideological, religious, professional and personal reasons: to learn or study with particular scholars, to explore the land and the people, or to fulfil academic requirements. They also came to volunteer, to explore personal options in Israel or to take time off from hectic lives. In addition to having varying goals, they were of different ages and came from different backgrounds. Nonetheless, they all shared similar experiences. The research indicates five factors that helped participants remain and complete their programs in Israel, despite the surrounding tension.

Support from the institutions

Participants needed to feel "looked after" and "cared for" by their programs during periods of crisis. During these intervals, students relied heavily on the guidance of their program's administrators to address their informational and emotional needs. Recognizing the students' inability to follow the local news (due to limited Hebrew skills), institutions provided English news resources and direct updates and staff briefed students on current events, especially after attacks. Staff supported students' emotional needs by offering to speak with parents directly, by providing access to psychologists and social workers at the institution's expense, and by making themselves available to students who needed encouragement.

As one young man noted, "When you hear a madrichah say, 'I'm scared, too, I am dealing with this, too, and it is hard to be here,' it makes you feel it is okay to go through this, to express fears, to not go out, to feel these things."

Support from families abroad

The attitude of parents played a significant role in the students' decision to come and to stay in Israel, regardless of the students' age. Parents also played an important role in how participants dealt with their emotions. In cases where parents were unsupportive, students constantly felt stressed, placating their concerned families while simultaneously trying to cope with the pressure of being in Israel under trying circumstances. One young woman said, "I have always told them everything, but now I leave things out, or I feel guilty when I am doing things... It is the first time I have felt I have to look out for my parents instead of them looking out for me, to make them feel safe and dumb it down to make them feel better about it."

These students were much more likely than those with supportive parents to leave Israel before their programs ended. In contrast, students whose parents supported their decisions were most likely to complete their programs.

In the words of one young woman, "I was glad that they were always supportive... because I think that was a big part of my year...being able to talk over everything with my parents and not having to deal with them saying, 'Maybe you should just come home,' or them not at all supporting what I was doing. That definitely helped in being here."

Visits by parents during the school year were generally successful in increasing the level of support for children. Students themselves saw that "the people that have problems dealing with their parents on the security level are those parents who had not been to Israel before or didn't come to Israel this year."

Another student mentioned that when her father came to visit, "He saw that the situation was not as bad as they thought."

Interpersonal connections with Israelis

The more involved participants became with Israeli society, the more they felt a sense of belonging rather than a sense of isolation. Seeing that even Israelis were afraid and needed to find ways to cope with the terrorism, many participants felt better about their own fears and struggles in deciding where they should or should not go. Their Israeli relatives advocated for them with their families in North America, and helped them negotiate boundaries of safety – that is, determining where to go and what to do. One student who spent much time with her relatives said, "I trust them in terms of security of where they would like to go, even if it is contrary to the [program's] restrictions."

Feeling part of Israel's destiny

In the process of discussing and negotiating with their parents about coming to Israel for a year, some students began to grasp the extent of their commitment to the Jewish state and how important it was for them to spend the year here. One woman said, "Only at the point where they said I couldn't go did I realize how badly I wanted to go... I just explained that it was imperative that I go to Israel, like I owe it to myself, to Israel."

Ongoing negotiations with parents, combined with the experience of being in Israel during a period of insecurity and hardship, allowed students to develop a strong allegiance to Israel and a greater understanding and closeness to Israelis.

'Chance to discover what it means to be a Zionist'

One young woman said, "Because of all the stuff going on, and [seeing] my teachers going to milu'im [army reserve duty], I saw what it means to have a commitment to something. I learned about myself that I stayed here through this... I never would have thought that I could do something like that... I definitely think that I am much more committed to coming back here [because] you really realize how much each person makes a difference here and each person's presence sort of uplifts other people."

Trusting oneself in negotiating boundaries of safety

In addition to relying on information given to them, participants also followed their own instincts in negotiating boundaries of safety. Students spoke about just doing what made them feel comfortable, and most agreed that the best thing they can do is to create boundaries and say, "This is what I feel comfortable with."

For some, this meant not taking buses, while others took buses but avoided cities or city centres at particular times of the day or week. For most, feeling comfortable meant avoiding crowded areas and making sure there were security guards at places they frequented. Students also spoke about doing things that were "scary" if they deemed them "appropriate and necessary" to the goals they had set out to accomplish while in Israel.

In describing what they considered important in creating boundaries, students exuded a sense of confidence that developed as they became more accustomed to their surroundings. Still, they understood that their boundaries were somewhat arbitrary. One student said, "I can't expect my boundaries to be rational because I am judging something completely irrational." As time passed, students accepted this level of uncertainty within their everyday lives.

Although bringing young people to study in Israel during periods of violence and insecurity is a difficult endeavour for all those involved, students on year-long programs during the 2001-2002 school year emphasized the positive aspects of being in Israel in a time of crisis. Those who had been in the country during more tranquil times agreed that they encountered a "different Israel" than before, but they felt that being in Israel during a crisis afforded them several unique opportunities. Many students said the situation gave them a chance to discover what it means to be a Zionist or what it means to be truly committed to the Jewish state. One woman suggested that experiencing an insecure period makes any future peace agreement "so much sweeter for us [because] we'll truly understand what it means."

Other participants spoke about the wealth of opportunities for intimate encounters and relationships with Israelis. In describing the significance of his year, one young man said, "The more someone talks to me, finds out what we did, why I came, what I received being here this year, they understand that it was worth it and I might not have gotten half of what I did out of this year if it wasn't for being in the country the way it is."

What worries me

Once again, Israel is frequently in the news and, as happens so often, the newscasts rarely have anything good to report. The image of Israel that is conveyed to the world is thoroughly unattractive: it features both internal and external conflicts. But the Israel I know and love has made wonderful achievements, has a strong education system and, above all, has survived successfully in an area of the world that would rejoice in seeing the Jewish state disappear altogether.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

This worries me no end. I am not afraid that Israel will be unable to withstand the pressures to which it is exposed. My fear is of a different kind: I worry not so much about the people of Israel as I worry about the Jewish people worldwide. In various conversations I have had with members of the Diaspora Jewish community, I have detected a note of troublesome fatigue. The old sense of firm resistance – expressed by the Hebrew phrase im kol zeh, "despite everything" – is heard less often nowadays, and I would like you, dear reader, to ask yourself whether you have yielded to the negative pressure of our environment. Are you silent when negative thoughts and feelings are expressed, or do you voice your own confidence – if indeed you have it, as I hope you do?

Yes, these are difficult and often troublesome times. But trouble is nothing new for Israel and the Jewish people. We have always managed to stand up against inimical forces and prevail. I like to think that we have not lost that capacity. I would welcome your response to this, how you react to the onslaught of negative news reports. Have you done anything about it?

I know that you would like to help correct the negative impressions these reports about Israel create. It will take only a small amount of your time to write a brief note to an offending publication and tell its editor that there are people who want to read the truth and not a repetition of someone's prejudice. You don't have to compose a whole megillah; all that is needed is a brief but clear expression of your opinion, backed up with relevant facts.

To write a brief but meaningful note supporting Israel and signing your name to it is a true mitzvah. There is a possibility you may have to express yourself in a less-than-friendly environment, but remember that our people need you to stand up straight and express the sense captured in the phrase ani kahn: "Here I am, ready to do my share."

So much for vacation...

Summer is in full swing and that usually means things have screeched to a grinding halt on campuses and at educational institutions everywhere.

We finally have time to do the things we've always wanted to do: read soul-inspiring books, go for windswept bicycle rides by the nearest body of water (cycling hard enough to narrowly escape accompanying mosquitoes by said body of water), and sit down to write that masterpiece we dream of creating, but keep putting off for whatever reasons seem plausible at the time.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Yet somehow it never works that way for me, though my intentions are always good to begin with.

I vowed to re-read through some of my all-time favorite novels – literary classics everyone should read at least once: High Fidelity, Flowers for Algernon, and the incredible, life-changing epic by Holocaust survivor and renowned psychiatrist Viktor Frankl, Man's Search for Meaning.

In scrapbooks with spines still stiff from not being cracked open, I put aside recently acquired doubles of all my photos from programs I've participated in, including Birthright and Do the Write Thing, a conference for Jewish journalism students and young professionals, as well as a General Assembly conference I attended in Washington, D.C.

But between going to weddings of old friends, working 12-hour days at a job where the bulk of my paycheque is handed over to the government and searching for my first apartment, I'm finding it hard to keep track of – much less organize– my memories.

Yet I feel lucky to be a student in Calgary – we have the highest employment rate in the country and a market that is very kind to those looking to rent a new home.

Wait a second… did I just use the word "kind"? Maybe I should take that back.

In the search for my first apartment, the first place I went to go see was a basement suite owned by a "sweet little old lady," I was assured by people who knew her.

But the suite turned out to be more like a hole. The door to the house opened and an 85-year-old woman resembling Gollum from Lord of the Rings came down the stairs to give me the grand tour.

There was no kitchen and the ceiling was unfinished, but the last straw was the stained mattress in the bedroom. When I said I would be bringing my own bed, the lady said, "No, that's not going to work for me. There's no sense wasting a perfectly good mattress."

The next advertisement I saw was for a "quiet young woman to share our quaint 1910 character home with."

Great, I thought to myself. I love quaint character homes. So I dropped by, only to find that there were four women sharing what looked like what was once a nice quaint character home but was now a pigsty.

"I have a cat – is that okay?" asked one of the women showing me around the house.

"Oh yeah, I don't have any allergies or anything," I said.

"But did my roommates tell you about my allergies?" she asked, and I shook my head no, warily.

"Well, I'm allergic to all shampoos, perfumes and soaps – do you use any of those things?" she asked.

Well, I like to wash myself as much as the next person, but I only wear perfume on special occasions, I replied.

"Do you mind if I smell you?" she asked, then leaned over and took a gigantic whiff before I could reply.

She exclaimed, "Wow, you're not very scented at all! I guess you'll do."

Since I did not plan on subjecting myself to being smelled every time I walk out of the house, I politely told her that this arrangement was not going to work for me.

"Well, give us a call if you change your mind! There are other options, you know," she said hopefully.

Yeah, like her moving out and my moving in, perhaps, I thought as I smiled weakly and bolted out the door.

All in a day's work, I suppose, though at the end I found myself drained of energy. Apparently the term "summer vacation" is an oxymoron. Though I'm not Orthodox, I'm discovering there is a great deal of good sense in keeping the Sabbath as a day of rest.

For somewhere in my room a forgotten bicycle is calling my name…

Leaving home in order to find it

It is always a challenge to come home from vacation. Returning to work and routine is no fun, but you have to do it.

I have been home from Israel for a week now, but as I can still taste the falafel on the tip of my tongue, I find myself suffering from a bad case of culture shock. Leaving Israel was very much like leaving home. I was stepping out of a life in which I fit so well.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

After a month of travel and 10 days on a Birthright trip, I settled (pardon the word choice) in Jerusalem. In my own apartment, I quickly found myself at home in "real life" living. Grocery shopping, running errands and going about my daily business, I was immersed in the daily flow of things. And as a student at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies, my days were filled with learning.

I always have difficulty classifying Pardes. It is best described as a pluralistic and liberal beit midrash/yeshiva. It is a place where Jews from all religious and educational backgrounds come to learn. Through the Tanach and Talmud, liturgy and Jewish thought, a group of divergent individuals connect with their common heritage.

My month of learning was a composite of eye-opening, revelatory experiences. With each successive day and class, I came to look at the material I was studying, and more importantly, myself, through changing eyes. As I learned and acquired textual skills and knowledge, my mind opened up and my attitude and perceptions changed in ways I never could have predicted.

Learning from teachers of all Jewish backgrounds and philosophies, and with students of so many different outlooks and ideologies, I quickly began evaluating myself, looking to understand where exactly I was coming from and where I was going.

During my month in Jerusalem, I found myself free of the monotony of a "normal" life and thus removed from its comfort. Through that departure, I experienced a transformation. That experience and its significance was reflected in the very text I was studying.

Every morning, my chevrutah partner and I would sit and dissect the words of Bereshit in the beit midrash. Focusing on the story of Avraham Avinu, we looked to Lech Lecha and the messages it conveys. One of the first questions asked in the class was why must Avraham leave his land, his birthplace, and the house of his father in order to wholly begin his journey before and toward God?

A personal reading seemed to make things clear. Sometimes we have to escape our surroundings to allow ourselves to change. When we remain in our "home" environment, happily confined to our comfort zone, it becomes easy to accept the givens. Life is so hectic, so static, that it is only natural to become complacent about both the state of the things that surround us and our own selves.

Avraham had to leave his home – his land, his birthplace and his family – but in leaving all that, he found something far greater. He had to leave his physical home in order to find the real home he needed.

Back in Canada, I found myself trapped. I had left a new home that felt so right and comfortable for the home I have always known and loved. It never ceases to amaze me that through leaving the comfortable, one gains so much. It is as if you need to step outside of things in order to truly stop and see the whole picture and decide if it matches the vision you hold of it.

Since I cannot simply pick up and move to Israel tomorrow, the challenge that lies before me is to try and meld the two worlds. After stepping outside of life in its normalcy, the struggle comes in stepping back in without retreating to the way things were. It is far less of a challenge to open your eyes and see the big picture from a distance, but it is far more difficult to retain that vision from up close. The goal is to retain a balance; with a modified goal comes a modified journey.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

It's summer, time to sit back and read a good book (and enjoy the balmy weather).

Ahron Bregman's A History of Israel (Palgrave) is a useful primer. He starts with the 1897 Zionist Congress in Basle and concludes with the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising. Bregman builds his narrative by fleshing out three grand themes: Jewish immigration, Israel's wars and Israel's quest for peace.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A recently re-issued version of Walter Laqueur's classic, A History of Zionism (Random House), touches all the bases: the philosophical underpinnings of the movement, the contributions of early ideologues such as Theodor Herzl and Nathan Birnbaum (who coined the term Zionism), the settling of the land and the campaign for statehood.

Traditions and Transitions in Israel Studies (State University of New York Press) unfolds through the medium of erudite essays by specialists and covers a great deal of territory. Among the topics: the 1956 Sinai war, Palestinian Arabs in Israel, post-Zionism and the peace process. Neil Caplan, one of the editors, teaches at Vanier College in Montreal. Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel, writes about the Arab-Israeli conflict and the new era of international terrorism in Chronicles of a War Foretold (Douglas & McIntyre). In Terrorism: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford University Press), Charles Townshend puts the problem in perspective.

Albert Hourani's re-issued A History of the Arab Peoples (Harvard University Press) treats this complex subject with empathy and balance. Hourani's observations concerning pivotal events – from the rise of Islam to the ascendancy of Arab nationalism – are penetrating. The Oxford Dictionary of Islam (Oxford University Press), edited by John Esposito, is comprehensive yet accessible. Islam: Religion, History, and Civilization (HarperCollins), by Seyyed Hossein Nasr, deals clearly with a cascade of relevant issues. In Means of Escape (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), seasoned war correspondent Philip Caputo vividly recalls his experiences in, among other hot spots, the Middle East.

Walter Pitman's Louis Applebaum: A Passion for Culture (The Dundurn Group) chronicles the late Canadian composer's life. And in a fine work of scholarship, Henry Abramson, a Canadian historian who teaches at Florida Atlantic University, delves into the troubled relationship between Jews and Ukrainians in A Prayer for the Government (Harvard University Press). Abramson focuses on the tumultuous period from 1917 to 1920, when a short-lived Ukrainian state, buffeted by anarchy, tried but failed to protect its Jewish citizens from rampaging pogromists. At a Winnipeg conference in the mid-1990s, Jews, Ukrainians and Mennonites gathered to reflect on their similarities and differences. A Sharing of Diversities (Canadian Plains Research Center) contains a selection of the papers delivered there.

The Oxford History of Byzantium (Oxford University Press), edited by Cyril Mango, traces the rise and fall of a far-flung empire. Mango claims that in its treatment of minorities, Byzantium was less tolerant than Islam and treated its Jews with contempt. Isaac Luria, the great Jewish mystic, comes alive in the pages of Lawrence Fine's Physician of the Soul, Healer of the Cosmos (Stanford University Press). Luria is inextricably linked with Safed, the Galilee town that spawned an impressive array of kabbalists.

Avraam Uri Kovner (1842-1909) was an author and critic who typified the struggle of assimilated Jews to integrate into Russian society, but who was ultimately ostracized by both communities. Harriet Murav, in Identity Theft (Stanford University Press), analyzes this curious figure from the past. How did the culinary traditions and habits of the Jews, the Italians and the Irish enhance their respective identity in the United States? Hasia Diner, in Hungering for America (Harvard University Press) elaborates on this theme in inventive fashion.

Jews have played a markedly disproportionate role in America's entertainment industry, having been closely identified with movies, radio and television. Entertaining America (Princeton University Press, by J. Hoberman and Jeffrey Shandler, explores this theme through punchy essays, arresting photographs and graphic posters.

Ruth Harriet Louise, who was born Ruth Goldstein, photographed the creme de la creme of Hollywood royalty from 1925 to 1930. In Ruth Harriet Louise and Hollywood Glamour Photography (University of California Press), Robert Dance and Bruce Robertson chronicle her brief career and showcase her stunningly sensual photographs.

In Civility in the City (Harvard University Press), Jennifer Lee, a Korean-American sociologist, zeroes in on an untouched topic: the relationships between Jewish, Korean and Afro-American merchants and their black customers in New York and Philadelphia. Lee's stock-in-trade is separating myth from reality.

When chassidic Jews opened a kosher slaughterhouse just outside a small town in Iowa, this rustic pocket of America was never the same again. With verve, Stephen Bloom, a gifted writer, tells of this clash of cultures in Postville (Harvest).

The Rebbe's Army (Random House), by Sue Fishkoff, is a discerning and empathetic portrait of Chabad Lubavitch. Ruth Gruber, the first newspaper reporter to cross the Soviet Arctic, recalls her student days in pre-Nazi Germany and her early years as a foreign correspondent in Ahead of Time (Carroll & Graff). The JPS Guide to Jewish Women (The Jewish Publication Society) profiles the role of outstanding Jewish women through the ages.

In Resilience and Courage (Yale University Press), Holocaust survivor and sociologist Nechama Tec compares the coping strategies women and men used in confronting Nazi terror. Yet another exemplary work by Tec. The Struma, bound for Palestine, was sunk by a Soviet submarine in 1942 after Turkey ordered it out of its territorial waters. All but one of the passengers, Jewish refugees fleeing persecution in Romania, drowned after it capsized. Death on the Black Sea (HarperCollins), by Douglas Frantz and Catherine Collins, relates the tragic story of the Struma and the valiant effort of a Jewish diver to salvage it from its watery crypt. Sole Survivor (Oxford University Press) is the incredible saga of a Chinese sailor who clung to a raft for 133 days after his ship was torpedoed by a German U-boat in 1942.

Irenka Licht, a Jewish girl from Poland, survived the Holocaust disguised as a Catholic. Licht, now Theresa Cahn-Tober, remembers the fear and confusion of her childhood in a remarkable memoir, Hide and Seek (University of New Mexico Press). Apart from Denmark, Bulgaria was the only German-occupied country whose Jewish citizens were not turned over to the Germans. Tzvetan Todorov explains why in The Fragility of Goodness (Princeton University Press), a nuanced account of courage and calculation. Image and Remembrance (Indiana University Press), edited by Shelley Hornstein and Florence Jacobowitz of York University, intelligently examines the ways in which the Holocaust is represented in monuments, memorials, movies, photography, painting and architecture.

The death throes of the Third Reich in the final months of World War II is the subject of Anthony Beevor's The Fall of Berlin 1945 (Viking), a first-rate book based in part on newly opened archives. Shadow Enemies (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), by Alex Abella and Scott Gordon, is a fast-paced account of Nazi Germany's plot to wreak havoc on key installations, train stations and Jewish department stores in the United States.

And in general... The granddaddy of all reference books, Who's Who 2003 (Raincoast), is filled to the brim with more than 32,000 concise biographies of personalities from all walks of life. It will be of interest to anyone who follows the news. The Internet Handbook for Writers, Researchers and Journalists (Fitzhenry & Whiteside) is a godsend, not only for professionals but for students. Keep it close at hand.

Going down the road... The season for exploring old and new destinations is upon us. Let's start with a cautionary note. The World's Most Dangerous Places (Raincoast), by Robert Young Pelton, alerts travellers to the myriad perils lurking beyond their doorsteps and lists countries to be avoided at all costs. The advice is dispensed in a no-nonsense style. As a companion volume, consider The Travel Doctor (Firefly Books), a sensible compendium that covers all situations.

Lonely Planet guidebooks, distributed by Raincoast Books, are extremely handy. Miami & and the Keys introduces you to Miami's must-see attractions, the upper, middle and lower Keys, the Everglades and Fort Lauderdale. Florida tells the rest of the story. Los Angeles Condensed zeroes in on interesting neighbourhoods, golden beaches, swanky restaurants and alluring wilderness preserves. Las Vegas is your ultimate guide to a neon oasis. Arizona gives you the lowdown on stunning desert vistas, exquisite national parks and native American culture. Hawaii: The Big Island is big on outdoor activities from swimming to surfing. The eighth edition of Canada is packed to the gills with facts, maps and evocative photos. Quebec offers insights into a beautiful destination. New York City fills in the blanks about the most exciting city in North America. Costa Rica and Jamaica explain why this Central American republic and this Caribbean island are so worth visiting. Mexico's Pacific Coast concentrates on such favourites as Acapulco, Puerto Vallarta and Mazatlan. New Zealand is an excellent primer on a captivating country. Delhi celebrates a colourful, frenetic city, while Rajasthan highlights one of India's greatest regions. Bangkok Condensed and Singapore Condensed are portraits of fascinating southeast Asia cities. East Coast Australia homes in on vibrant towns and unrivalled coral reefs. Have a good vacation.

Writing while running from the Cossacks

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Born about 1620 in Ostrog, Volhynia, Rabbi Nathan Hanover, along with his family, was among the countless Jews in Ukraine and eastern Poland whose lives were disrupted by the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648 and the intermittent attacks that continued for years after.

Author of several books, Rabbi Hanover's most famous work by far is Yeven Metzulah ("The Abyss of Despair"), a graphic and gripping account of the horrors that occurred in Ukraine and eastern Poland when Bogdan Chmielnicki led the Cossacks into attack.

Tatars from the Caucaucus region joined the Ukrainians in their nationalistic rebellion against the Polish nobility and their largely Jewish landlords. By conservative estimates, tens of thousands of Jews were slaughtered and many Poles also died.

In 1648, Rabbi Hanover was living in his wife's town of Zaslaw, one of the first places to be hit. He and his family fled but most of the town's Jews, including his father-in-law, were killed. While on the run, he learned that his own father had also been killed in a Cossack raid on Ostrog.

A gifted orator, Rabbi Hanover supported his family as an itinerant preacher. Wandering through eastern Poland and Ukraine, he spoke with refugees from many ravished communities and heard many horrific stories.

In Ostropol, Rabbi Samson exhorted the community to repent of their sins so the town would be spared from attack. The community followed his advice but, Rabbi Hanover writes, "the evil decree had already been sealed." In Polannoe, he says, thousands died like lambs without fighting back: "A single Ukrainian invading a dwelling which housed several hundred Jewish persons would kill all of them and would meet no resistance."

In Tulczyn, the Ukrainians assembled the Jews in an enclosed garden, where several rabbis exhorted the community not to abandon their faith. Three times the Cossacks invited the Jews to convert and save themselves, but not one Jew took up the offer and some 1,500 perished.

In some towns, women escaped certain rape by jumping into moats surrounding the fortress walls; many drowned or were shot or stabbed in the water. Rabbi Hanover tells of a beautiful maiden from a wealthy family whom a Cossack forced to become his wife. Convincing him that she possessed a certain magic and that no weapon could harm her, she urged him to shoot her. He did "and she fell and died for the sanctification of the Name, to avoid being defiled by him, may God avenge her blood."

As the invaders besieged one village after another (more than 700 in total), the villagers fled. "Whoever had a horse and cart travelled in it. Those who did not possess a horse and cart, even though they had sufficient money to buy them, would not wait, but took wife and children by the hand and fled on foot, casting away all belongings." Rabbi Hanover describes roads clogged for miles, the air charged with wild rumours and panic.

Rabbi Hanover's somewhat embellished historical account stands as the most enduring memorial to both himself and the destroyed communities it describes. (The above quotations are taken from Abraham Mensch's English translation, published by Transaction Books in 1983.)

For centuries before 1648, Jews had been moving eastward into Poland and Turkey from Spain, Alsace and the Rhineland. After 1648, the eastward trend was reversed. Many historians argue that the Chmielnicki massacres set the stage for the emergence of the false messiah Shabbetai Tzvi about 1666, as well as the revolutionary chassidic movement of the next century.

Patron of the golden age

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

The period from the mid-10th century until 1400 is often referred to as the golden era of Spanish Jewry. The beginning of this era can be traced to one individual, Chasdai Ibn Shaprut. In his time, Spain was no longer Catholic, as all but the northernmost territories had been conquered by the Muslims of North Africa.

In the 10th century, the entire territory was under the rule of a powerful and charismatic leader, Caliph Abdel al Harachaman. He succeeded in consolidating the newly captured provinces under his rule, a situation that continued until his passing in 961. His home and capital was the city of Cordoba.

Abdel al Harachaman was not only an astute politician but also a liberal and enlightened individual. Under his sponsorship, the arts and sciences flourished in Muslim Spain. This caliph chose as his personal physician a Jew by the name of Chasdai Ibn Shaprut. In medieval times, Muslim rulers also entrusted their physicians with administrative and political responsibilities. The position was highly regarded, considered as a combination of guru, confidant and soothsayer.

Chasdai Ibn Shaprut gained the full trust of the caliph, and the two men set out to develop the kingdom. The caliph soon elevated Chasdai Ibn Shaprut to the highest level of his cabinet. A visible Jew, he was sent by the caliph to be his personal representative in the northern territories to negotiate treaties between Muslims and Christians. Chasdai Ibn Shaprut also used his position of power and wealth as a diplomat with connections all the way to the caliph to further the cause of his brethren.

In the same way that the caliph nurtured the development of knowledge, Chasdai Ibn Shaprut became a patron of Torah scholarship in fields as diverse as biblical grammar, poetry, mathematics and astronomy.

The imprint of Chasdai Ibn Shaprut in his broad and scientific approach to the world of nature, his love of beauty and art and, of course, Torah scholarship set the agenda for the next era known as that of the Rishonim.

Indeed it can be said that one of Chasdai Ibn Shaprut's accomplishments was that he became a prototype for many courtiers who followed thereafter, and for men of nobility who used their position and power to advance their community. His influence remains until today in defining a unique Sephardi outlook. Hence, the name of Chasdai Ibn Shaprut is venerated as one of the first and noblest names of Spanish Jewry.

God's Secretaries: The Making of the King James Bible*, by Adam Nicolson, HaperCollinsPublishers, 2003, $38.95.

When James VI of Scotland ascended to the throne of England in 1603 as James I, there were two competing Christian bibles: the Bishops' Bible, preferred by the church authorities, and the Geneva Bible, the favourite of the people.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Bishops' Bible was royalist and anti-puritan: the Geneva Bible was explicitly anti-royalist. James, a great lover of language, and no mean diplomat, seized the opportunity to bring his people together by decreeing a new translation. He had a grand dream of forging a harmoniously united realm out of the faction-ridden one he inherited from Elizabeth I. Of course, no such thing happened. Dissent and disunity continued unabated and would eventually spill over into civil war.

The king called together a group of theologians and churchmen at Hampton Court in January 1604. Fifty-four "learned men" were divided into six panels: three for the Old Testament, two for the New Testament, and one for the Apocrypha. They began their work in 1606, meeting at Oxford, Cambridge, and Westminster Abbey.

The esteemed translators were a highly diverse group of writers, poets and scholars. The author provides a colourful depiction of many of these personalities, with all their faults. Although their collective expertise in biblical languages and related fields has never been matched, they were fallible human beings: muddled, sometimes drunk, self-serving, ambitious, pedantic and not above a kind of scholarly ruthlessness.

This gaggle of fifty animated translators pored over the Greek and Hebrew texts, comparing the accuracy and felicity of previous translations, arguing with each other over the finest details of chapter and verse.

Nine-tenths of the words they chose were of Saxon derivation, and, surprisingly, the translation has a vocabulary of only 8,000 words. Taking into account the translations of their predecessors, especially the martyred William Tyndale, they kept his many Hebraic turns of phrase. These included "to die the death," "the Lord's anointed," "the gate of heaven," "a man after his own heart," "the living God," "sick unto death," "flowing with milk and honey," "to fall by the sword," "as the Lord liveth," "a stranger in a strange land," "to bring the head down to the grave," and "apple of his eye." It is said that he also introduced into English the adjective "beautiful," and was the first to use the name "Jehovah" for the Lord.

Once people were free to interpret the word of God according to their own understanding, they began to question the authority of their inherited institutions – both religious and secular. This led, in time, to reformation within the church and the rise of constitutional government in England. In a very real sense, the King James Bible changed the course of human history.

The English translation of the Jewish Publication Society in 1917 was essentially a modest revision of the King James Bible in its 1885 version.

In 1985, the JPS published its Tanakh, which was translated directly from the traditional Hebrew text into modern English. It eliminated all Christological emphases, took into account new archeological and philological findings and made use of Jewish commentators. Of course, much of the beauty of the King James version was retained.

Adam Nicolson has been both a publisher and a travel writer. In God's Secretaries, he offers the general reader a dramatic and measured account of how one of the great, enduring and influential works of English literature came into being.

Tisha b'Av and the three weeks

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Is Tisha b'Av relevant to Jews today? What importance does the 17th of Tammuz have or the three weeks of mourning that bridge these two fast days? Those questions are central to a debate you'll find on many Web sites as we enter what is traditionally the most mournful period in the Jewish calendar. Starting with the 17th of Tammuz and culminating on the Ninth of Av, these three weeks recall the destruction of the First and Second Temples and many other persecutions of the Jewish people. But what importance do they have now that we have a vibrant State of Israel and a rebuilt Jerusalem?

First, some background. Several sites offer excellent overviews of these two fast days and the period between them, such as Virtual Jerusalem [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/3 weeks/], Aish HaTorah [http://www.aish.com/holidays/tisha_bav_and_ the_3_weeks/] and Jewish Heritage Online Magazine [http://www.jhom.com/calendar/av/]. When you need a break from the reading, you can listen to related lectures and songs at 613.org [http://www.613.org/3weeks.html].

In "Some Reflections on the Modern Meaning of Tisha b'Av," David Janus asks how one is supposed to mourn for Jerusalem when the city "is now home to more Jews than ever before in its history, it is a city filled with synagogues and houses of study, it is a city filled with light and with life." Although we now have political sovereignty, Janus contends, "We mourn for the loss of spirituality in individuals. We mourn because so many people do not realize what is missing in their lives, we mourn because so many people do not have within themselves the notion of the divine. We mourn because Jerusalem is not completely rebuilt" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?K2C512225].

Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, supports the observance of Tisha b'Av but has concerns about the three weeks. He writes, "One day of remembrance, enacted wholeheartedly, is sufficient. Three weeks of escalating mournfulness, beginning with the fast day on the 17th of Tammuz, threatens to turn martyrology and victimhood into a world view. The creation of Israel has endowed the Jewish people with an unprecedented degree of power that is ill-served by a festering sense of resentment, an abiding angst over insecurity and a messianic zeal to right past wrongs. To brood on our long history of impotence can only blunt our political judgment in an age when so much has changed and obscure the ideals of justice and righteousness that were to mark the descendants of Abraham and cast a beacon for the world" [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/parashah/5758/mattotmasay.shtml].

Responding to Schorsch, Jonathan Rosenblum writes in the Jerusalem Post that the three weeks play a crucial role as a time of preparation for Tisha b'Av. He asks whether a soccer team would consider skipping training to better concentrate on the World Cup itself. As for Schorsch's concerns about victimhood, Rosenblum says the purpose of this period is not to dwell on our oppression by others but to focus on our own "collective failings for which the Temple was destroyed and has yet to be rebuilt" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?K2C512225].

Just months after 9/11, Daniel Treiman wrote in the Forward that several congregations saw a newfound relevance in Tisha b'Av and decided to observe the date for the first time in several years.

Jaime Shpall, a cantor at Congregation Beth Israel, a Reform synagogue in Austin, Tex., writes, "It just seems that with what's happening in Israel and the world this year after Sept. 11, it would be something that our congregation really is looking for."

Rabbi Jerome Epstein of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, adds, "All of the significant occasions that Tisha b'Av commemorates are potentially possible again… If you look at Europe today, it's not hard to imagine what potentially could happen to our people." Just a few years ago, he says, "Everybody said, 'Why should we even observe Tisha b'Av? Israel is so strong; Israel is flourishing.' And there was a tendency to say, 'Tisha b'Av is irrelevant'" [http://www.forward.com/issues/2002/02.07.12/fast 4.html].

Chandler meets relatives in Australia

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

A Toronto woman was recently united with descendents of the relative who saved her life in the Holocaust.

Elsa Chandler, 70, and her husband Howard flew to Australia last month to meet the grandchildren of her great-uncle Ephraim Ratz.

Chandler never thought she had living relatives. Her daughter Hedy, who found the new cousins through JewishGen, a Jewish genealogy Web site, was stunned.

"How could I make this discovery after all these years?" she said.

Ratz's three adult children left Poland in 1939 and settled in Australia under new names. Siegfried Ratz became Stanley Reed; Leonhard Ratz became Lou Rae; Erna Ratz married and took her husband's name. Meanwhile, Chandler's family was caught in Lvov, Poland, when the Germans invaded and World War II began.

Chandler was eight when the war started. She knew of Ephraim Ratz, but didn't know that he had children. When she was liberated from Bergen-Belsen six years later, she thought that only she and one other relative had survived.

She came from a well-to-do family. Her mother had been educated at the music conservatory in Vienna, and her great-uncle was a wealthy industrialist who owned property in Krakow.

Chandler's family was separated in the Lvov ghetto and she and her mother were taken to the Krakow ghetto, where her great-uncle was living. She later learned that Ratz had arranged for the move, she believes by bribing the German guards.

When the Krakow ghetto was liquidated, her mother and great-uncle were taken to Plaszow, and Chandler, along with all the other children, were left behind in the burning streets. Soon someone came and called her name. Ratz had sold "half of Krakow" to get her out of the ghetto and bring her to Plaszow. There she was the only child; her mother hid her from the guards.

"Because of his intervention I stayed alive," she said. "Otherwise I would have perished."

Chandler never saw her uncle after that. She was transferred with her mother to a series of slave labour camps. Ratz was sent to Mauthausen; she later learned that he died three weeks after his liberation, his body beaten by the harsh camp life.

At the war's end, Chandler was a 13-year-old orphan. Her mother died in Bergen-Belsen shortly before they were liberated. The memory still pains her.

While recovering from tuberculosis in Sweden, Chandler contacted her father's sister in Toronto, who brought her to Canada. Here she rebuilt her life. Her sole connection to her past was a photo of a monument near Vienna erected in honour of Ratz by an uncle who survived Mauthausen, the only other living relative she knew of.

Sixty years later in Sydney, Australia, Paul Reed, who was raised as a non-Jew, was searching for his roots. His father

Stanley never talked about his past. Reed knew his grandfather's name, a "funny-sounding European name," and that he had a photo of a monument erected for Ratz near Vienna that a relative in the United States had sent him in the '60s.

Reed posted a notice on JewishGen.

At the same time, Hedy Chandler was in Toronto searching for relatives of Ephraim Ratz. She discovered several people searching for members of the Ratz family and sent them e-mails, but got no response.

"About three weeks later I went back and something was nagging me. I swear it was bashert. As far as I'm concerned this is all fate. I wrote a letter to only one person, and it was Paul Reed," said Hedy Chandler. "I got a letter back from him. It said, 'I'm happy to share with you whatever information I have. My grandfather was Ephraim Ratz.'"

The discovery shocked everyone.

"It made us all get goosebumps because we knew right away we were connected," said Elsa Chandler. She carried Reed's letter in her purse for weeks after that.

Not only did Chandler have relatives, her cousins in Australia also had family photos from Poland before the Holocaust, of her great-uncle and his wife, faces she barely remembered.

"Sixty years later, she has a validation that what she remembers before the war is true," said Hedy Chandler. "I feel like this is a gift for my mother."

Silverman drawn to German birthplace

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Last fall, Esther Silverman visited Bad Wörishofen, the town in southern Germany where she was born in 1949, because she says, "It was important for me to see it. I just had to do it."

It was something she couldn't do 20 or even 10 years ago, "but now I was compelled in a challenging way to fill the gap in my life." She compares her feelings to an adopted person who wants to find his or her birth parents.

"I needed to put the pieces together – to connect because my parents were Holocaust survivors, and losing my father when I was young made it even more important."

Her parents, Helen (Goldband) and Chaim Rosen, both from Lodz, Poland, survived Auschwitz and met in Germany. They married on Feb. 17, 1948, in Bad Wörishofen, a town near Augsburg, Bavaria.

"My parents' wedding was performed in an outdoor chupah with guests who where all survivors and came from different parts of Germany."

Silverman's parents emigrated to Toronto in the fall of 1950, when she was 1½ years old. "They wanted to go to Israel, but while waiting for papers in Germany, they decided to join my mother's older sister in Canada."

Although her mother rarely spoke of the war years and

Toronto rabbi experiences 'new guy' phenomenon

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Rabbi David Bauman walks through the doors of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, congregants literally flock to him.

"You walk into the room and there's a flood of people coming to you. That's never happened to me before," says the newly hired assistant rabbi, who started in mid-June.

Rabbi Bauman

"It's really nice and very warm."

Rabbi Bauman is experiencing the "new guy" phenomenon. Synagogue members are eager to meet and greet this fresh new face, to get a taste of who he is and what he stands for.

Rabbi Bauman, in turn, says he wants to have a positive impact on his congregants.

"I think and I hope that first and foremost, I'm a mensch, that I'm a down-to-earth person who is willing to listen and connect with people," he says.

"Once that's established, I think I'm the type of person who is very charismatic, energetic and excited about Jewish living… I hope that will rub off onto other people."

Rabbi Bauman's philosophy is in sync with Beth Emeth's traditional conservative ideology.

"I believe in classic, rabbinic Judaism. That is a Judaism that evolves and develops over time, but works within the parameters of Jewish law," he says.

"That traditional aspect is what made me interested in Toronto and specifically Beth Emeth," says Rabbi Bauman, who recently wrapped up rabbinical duties at a small New York synagogue before heading to Toronto with his wife, Elly, and two young sons.

With nearly 1,500 families, Beth Emeth's sheer size has necessitated two full-time rabbis for many years.

Senior rabbi Howard Morrison says along with other duties, Rabbi Bauman's primary responsibility "is to in-reach and outreach… the younger echelons of the congregation.

"We have put him in areas where we need more personal rabbinic involvement," Rabbi Morrison says.

Rabbi Bauman's journey to the rabbinate, like many rabbis today, did not start off with an observant upbringing.

But the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) graduate was raised to have a strong Jewish identity during his childhood in Reading, Penn.

"It was very important for my parents to make sure my sister and I had a Jewish education, meaning [attending evening] religious school. We were very active in the B'nai B'rith Youth Organization."

Befriending the son of an Orthodox rabbi, Rabbi Bauman started to become more interested in his faith while in high school and university.

By the time he was in graduate school at New York University working on a master's degree in education and counselling psychology, he was increasing his level of observance.

"My observance had been growing, but I really wanted to get back in and learn some classics of our tradition," he says.

While working at a college in Buffalo, N.Y. about seven years ago, Rabbi Bauman became active in a local conservative synagogue.

"The rabbi kind of ignited a spark - you could do this, too."

Rabbi Bauman applied to JTS, was accepted and officially completed his studies on May 22.

He says he is in Toronto thanks largely to three colleagues.

Rabbi Bauman's friend, Rabbi David-Seth Kirshner, worked at Beth Emeth during the High Holy Days last year and told Rabbi Bauman that the congregation and city is "the perfect place for you."

He then consulted with the dean of students at the seminary, Rabbi Joseph Brodie, who is a mentor and close friend of Rabbi Morrison.

Not surprisingly, Rabbi Brodie also encouraged Rabbi Bauman to head north.

Finally, there was Rabbi Morrison.

"Rabbi Morrison was what ultimately attracted me to come here and work in this community," Rabbi Bauman says.

"I'm looking for someone who will teach me, challenge me, who will let me grow and make mistakes so I will learn. I couldn't have found a better person."

Sitting with the two rabbis, it's evident they are on the same page.

"We see ourselves as rabbis to the Jewish people," Rabbi Morrison says.

"Our Judaism is not an all-or-nothing Judaism. Our Judaism is not a coercive Judaism. Our Judaism is to experience learning, climbing the ladder one step at a time… always with the idea that I can strive to do more with guidance and respect."

With a focus on younger congregants, Rabbi Bauman hopes to spend time at local university/college campuses and even play basketball with teens. He is relishing his new role.

"Coming from a non-traditional background… I can understand their struggles between the traditional and the modern world in which they live," he says.

Rabbi Morrison, who has been an ordained rabbi for 16 years, believes he and his new young colleague will be of great benefit to their congregants.

New Beth Tikvah choir director also a composer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eyal Bitton had three potential strikes against him when he was applying for the position of choir director at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

He has no formal music education other than a couple of months of guitar lessons at age 14, he doesn't play much piano, and he was late for the interview. (A native of Montreal, he had yet to learn about Toronto taxis at rush hour, he explains.)

But the personable 33-year-old – a composer, lyricist and librettist and executive producer of his own company Kahina Productions, as well as a musical director – won over choir members and search committee alike, said Heather Shapero, who headed the committee that screened 12 "strong candidates.

"What made him stand out was his talent, his breadth in terms of what he does in music, his background in both Ashkenazi and Sephardi music, and his experience in choral directing," she said.

The fact Bitton is also a composer – like his predecessor, the late Srul Irving Glick, who was choir director and composer-in-residence for 32 years – was a bonus, Shapero said.

Bitton, who moved here from Montreal to become choir director on May 1, was 13 when he joined the choir at Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, where he became choir director at age 19. At the same time, he developed a passion for rock music, got an acoustic guitar and "started to understand how harmony works."

A native of Montreal who spent his early years from 1971 to 1978 in Zaire, Bitton also enjoyed writing poetry and had acquired a love of literature from his mother, an English teacher. Although there are no other professional musicians in the family, Bitton's father, an electrical engineer, and his 93-year-old grandfather were always singing, he said.

Bitton started to write '80s-type rock music after he finished high school, but these days his compositions are more likely to reflect elements of classical music and musical theatre – epic themes rather than show tunes, he said.

"With my love of literature and poetry, songwriting came together pretty quickly."

He also wrote Jewish liturgical music (he has directed a number of Jewish choirs), and branched out into larger-scale projects with an oratorio inspired by Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary in 1996.

"As I wrote it, I was on fire," he recalled. "I was very encompassed in the process. I would stay up until 3 or 5 a.m., and it was a joy."

RIGHT OF PASSAGE: The Journey To Jerusalem was performed in Montreal before an audience of almost 1,000 people as an official Jerusalem 3000 event under the auspices of the Israeli consulate, he said. It featured a 25-piece orchestra and a 175-member choir.

Bitton followed that success with more original productions, including KING DAVID The Musical, a two-hour show for which he wrote the book, music and lyrics. He also wrote the lyrics for the musical of Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, among other projects, and is currently working as a script consultant on a movie.

His work has drawn on his Jewish heritage, but is not aimed exclusively at Jewish audiences, he added. A graduate of McGill University, where he majored in Jewish studies, Bitton writes music "to communicate and to make a connection with the audience," he said.

His work also connected him with his fiancée, actor Michèle Tredger, when she auditioned for his musical production, THE CHILD, an Arthurian-type legend.

Although she was "ultimately the reason" he moved to Toronto, he also felt it was time for a new phase in his career.

Working with choirs, he relishes transmitting his passion for music, he said. His next appearance with Beth Tikvah's synagogue choir will be on the High Holy Days. He is also working with the synagogue's community, or non-liturgical choir, called Kol Shira.

Bitton has already started work on one of his own compositions with the choir, and he expects to introduce some Sephardi elements as well. (Bitton's father is Sephardi and his mother is Ashkenazi.)

Although he knew Glick only by reputation, Bitton said their music was featured together in a Montreal concert by the St. Lambert Choral Society a few years ago.

"I see my mission here as preserving Srul Irving Glick's music, but also building on it," he said. "One of the things he left here was a passion for creativity. He gave [choir members] a thirst for new challenges."

Silverman met her husband Len, a retired teacher, at the University of Toronto. After graduation, he continued his studies at the University of Ottawa, receiving a master's degree in science. She worked as a successful insurance agent for 18 years with Co-operator's Insurance and Financial Services before retiring a year ago. The couple have two sons, Stuart and Ryan.

Six years ago, Esther, her mother, two sisters, a brother, an aunt and uncles and cousins went to Poland were they visited Lodz as well as Krakow and Warsaw. "We wanted to discover where my grandparents and other members of our family were buried. We put up a stone in Lodz and we had a ceremony to commemorate their lives there."

In October 2002, as part of a visit to their son Stuart who was studying in Finland, Esther and Len, who now writes science textbooks and teaches part time, decided to go to Bad Wörishofen to see the house where Esther was born. It's now a modern seniors home.

Esther says, "I don't remember anything about the town, but when I arrived at the place where I was born, it felt familiar and comfortable, as I had heard so many stories about the house and the town."

The Silvermans also visited the Josefsheim Convalescent Hospital, where her father and uncles recuperated after the war.

"The hospital was celebrating its 75th anniversary with an open house the very day we visited. Coincidentally, a brief tour of Josefsheim added to the already surreal day. My uncle, Abram Rosen, had recently died, unexpectedly. This tragedy made the visit with him in Frankfurt and our visit to Bad Wörishofen all the more poignant."

Esther believes that she went there "because I wanted to test myself. I didn't want to eliminate the early part of my life, and although I was fearful of how I would react, it was very important for me to see."

The Silverman's spent only one day in Bad Wörishofen. She describes the experience as "almost like going over a large boulder. After 50 years, I finally accomplished what I was determined to do since I was a teenager – to visit my birthplace. It was putting the pieces of my life together."

Volpe said the MPs wanted to get away from a purely "reactive" approach to Mideast events.

"We said we have to come up with something coherent and encompassing, rather than piecemeal reactions to issues as they come up," Volpe said.

"It's not just a critique of our foreign policy regarding the Middle East, it's a road map for understanding what is going on and suggesting solutions from a Canadian perspective.

"My critique of the Canadian position has been that we're trying to have a balanced position so we can be the honest broker," Volpe said. "Give me a break. People are dying every day."

Volpe said Canada must stand for Israel's right to peace within secure and recognized borders.

Peterson said he's disagreed for some time with some aspects of Canadian policy, including part of its UN voting record and its criticism of Israel when it responds to terrorist attacks.

"One of the most egregious occasions was when we said Israel does not have the right to pursue terrorists in the territories and defend itself against them," he said.

Eggleton, Canada's former defence minister, said the report addresses some deficiencies in Canadian policy, such as criticism when Israel responds to terrorism. "It's not proper to think of those situations of Israel attempting to defend its people as some sort of attack or retaliation on the Palestinians. It's part of a police action" aimed at dismantling terrorism, he said.

Canada, Eggleton noted, took part in the Afghan campaign against terrorism, much as Israel is doing when it defends itself against Palestinian terrorism.

Neville, who recently visited Washington, D.C., on a program sponsored by parliament's Canada-Israel Friendship Group, said "it's important that the politicians, not just the bureaucrats, have input on the policy-making process."

She said the report asks policy-makers to consider Arafat an impediment to meaningful peace.

The MPs and senators agreed Israel enjoys support in the caucus beyond the dozen who signed the report. With the document on the table, their next step will be to meet colleagues, DFAIT officials and representatives of the Jewish community to solicit broader backing for the initiative, Neville said.

Among the recommendations outlined in the report:

- Canada should not use the term "proportionate response" in connection with Israeli security measures and should not second guess legitimate measures aimed at combatting terrorism;
- Canada should not used the term "cycle of violence," as that equates terror attacks with their response;
- Canada should reverse its earlier policy of recognizing Arafat as head of the PLO and simply recognize the Palestinian Authority as the principal representative of the Palestinian people;
- Canada should endorse the road map for peace and contribute to the plan's multilateral track;
- Canada should lobby the UN General Assembly, western democracies and other international organization against the politicization of the UN;
- Canada should work with the Lebanese government to remove the military presence of Syria and Hezbollah in Lebanon;
- Canada should urge Saudi Arabia to tackle the underlying causes of Islamic extremism in that country;
- Canada should demand that Iran stop supporting terrorism and it should call on the UN Commission on Human Rights to re-establish its rapporteur there.

CORRECTION:

In "Number of programs available to study in Israel" (CJN, July 10), the scholarships offered by UJA Federation were inaccurately explained. The Morris M. Pulver Scholarship Fund for Israel is awarded to full-time students at a recognized institution of higher education in Israel. The Israel Scholarship helps send students only to hesder yeshivot. The Meyer W. Gasner-Joe Berman Scholarship Fund Gasner/ Berman Scholarship assists students who are studying primarily at non-hesder yeshivot in Israel. Preference is given to students who plan to follow a career in Jewish education upon their return from Israel. The CJN regrets these errors.

About Food

Dear Norene

BY NORENE GILLETZ

I never quite got the hang of gardening. I tell people that I have a "black thumb" and that any plants that come under my care are sure to commit suicide because they realize they won't live very long! My husband Soly grew up in Israel eating the fruits (and vegetables) of his mother's garden, so he tends to all our plants, which thrive beautifully under his care.

The Cook's Garden, 100 Favourite Recipes and Expert Growing Advice from Canadian Gardening Magazine (McArthur & Company, $29.95) might transform me into a gardening guru as well as a cooking maven.

This beautiful book is packed with colour photographs, recipes and tips. Organized according to the seasons, it includes excellent information on how to grow and cook over 40 types of fruits and vegetables. I was tempted by Grilled Portobello on Greens, Spinach Cheese Tart, Sour Cherry Cobbler and Classic Strawberry Fool, Most recipes are suitable for the kosher cook.

After browsing through this wonderful book, your most difficult choice will be whether to keep it with your gardening books or your cookbooks! Meanwhile, until I do plant a garden, I'll have to be content with visiting the local farmers' markets to enjoy the bounty of the land. Enjoy.

ROASTED TOMATOES

Roasting tomatoes gives them deep flavour, particularly if the tomatoes are not at their best. Once roasted, they can be stored, refrigerated, for up to two weeks. Use them in sauces, or mixed with other vegetables such as zucchini and eggplant. Roast any kind of tomatoes, but plum tomatoes, because of their thicker skins, work best. For a fast first course, fill roasted tomato with mozzarella cheese, bake until cheese melts, then pop on top of a salad.

1 tbsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 450. Cut tomatoes in half and place cut side down on oiled baking sheet. Roast 20 to 25 minutes, depending on size and juiciness. Tomato skin should be slightly brown and cracked. Reserve for later use.

MELON LASSI

A lassi is a refreshing, East Indian yogurt shake. Enjoy one for breakfast or as a cooling and delicious complement to a spicy dinner. Any type of melon can be used.

3 cups plain yogurt
3 tbsp. liquid honey
1½ cups melon chunks
½ cup ice water
fresh mint

In a blender, combine all ingredients except mint, and process until mixture is frothy. Serve over ice; garnish with mint sprigs. Serves 4.

Try fresh-baked whole wheat challah

BY LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

The first time I tasted whole wheat challah, it was warm from the oven in a cool desert. I was in my 20s, and lost, figuratively and literally, in a tiny Israeli town called Arad.

The woman who introduced me and a group of other escapees from regular lives to her dense braided loaf worked, baked, cleaned and lived in a small apartment with an enormous view of the Negev desert.

She wasn't one of the quiet, veiled women of the local Bedouin tribes, or one of the regal but confused Ethiopian ladies I met in my dormitory trying to stuff hand-woven rugs into the dryer, or one of the sabras who comfortably walked in leather sandals despite the frigid winter rains.

No, this baker of breads was named Cheryl. She was from New York. She and her rabbi husband had only one child, which was unusual in the religious group they led.

Over a decade later, I can still see the scrap of paper I wrote Cheryl's challah recipe on. I believe it was yellow. I believe I'll find it one day, after my next move. After I finally empty my boxes somewhere, to stay.

But for now, in a small apartment in Los Angeles, my daughter and I enjoyed a different whole wheat challah, one just as good, maybe even better. Because it was baked and sent to me by a friend's sister, Kay Levenson.

I tore off a piece of her challah, warmed it in the oven, smothered the soft speckled insides with butter and honey, and ate, standing in my kitchen, watching the skinny palms sway.

Maybe Cheryl's recipe blew away in one of those long windy bus rides from Arad to Tel Aviv. Maybe eating fresh baked bread reminds me how important it is for each of us to find our truest sense of home.

KAY LEVENSON'S WHOLE WHEAT CHALLAH

Kay makes this recipe with different proportions of whole wheat and white flour and variations of other flours as well, such as cornmeal and rye. She says the more whole wheat flour, the heavier the loaf, so mix with the white flour according to your taste. She usually bakes four small loaves from this recipe and sticks two in the freezer for the next week.

3 tbsp. (or 3 packages) fresh yeast
¼ cup warm water
1 tsp. sugar
1 cup vegetable oil
2 cups sugar
6 eggs, beaten
1 tbsp. salt
2 cups oatmeal (not instant)
4 cups white unbleached flour
1 cup warm water
5 cups whole wheat flour
1½ cups raisins, sunflower seeds, or other nuts to taste (optional)

Glaze
1 egg
½ cup warms water
poppy or sesame seeds or oats

Oil two baking trays and sprinkle with oatmeal (to prevent sticking and add extra flavour to bottom crust).

In a small bowl, dissolve yeast in warm water with a teaspoon of sugar and set aside to proof (or expand), approximately 8-10 minutes.

In large bowl, mix oil, sugar, eggs, salt, oats, white flour and cup of warm water. Mix thoroughly. Add yeast mixture. If desired, add raisins, sunflower seeds or nuts. Then gradually add whole wheat flour, mixing as much as possible in bowl, then kneading on countertop approximately 5-10 minutes until dough is elastic, not sticky. If necessary add more flour. Place in oiled bowl. Cover and let rise in a warm place until approximately doubled in size, about 1 to 2 hours. Punch down, and shape into 2 larger or 4 small loaves. Let the loaves rise one hour.

Preheat oven to 350.Brush loaves with one beaten egg mixed with ½ cup of warm water and sprinkle with poppy seeds, sesame seeds, or oats. Bake until golden brown, 45 minutes to 1 hour.

Variations: Kay says a nice alternative is to substitute one cup of honey for one of the cups of sugar. Or for a dairy challah, use 1 cup of scalded milk in place of the 1 cup of warm water.

Student journal is a microcosm of the Mideast

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

As an editor of Gam Yachad, a literary journal produced by university students about Israel and the Arab-Israeli conflict, Yaakov Roth ran into some serious difficulties.

"I had to edit some poems," says Roth, who is a third-year chemistry and economics student at York University. "And that's kind of difficult when you're not a poet."

Although Roth was instrumental in the editing process, and even wrote a poem of his own, the credit for the idea goes to Jason and Dalia Rotstein.

In September of 2002, the Rotstein siblings wanted to do something to show their support for Israel. The timing was fitting: it was around the time of the first anniversary of the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, and the threat of terrorism, both in North America and Israel, was on everyone's mind.

The siblings brought Roth on board, whom Jason had known from high school, to become the third editor.

As the months passed, Gam Yachad grew in size. By the end, it was more than 200 pages and had nearly 60 pieces of poetry, prose and short fiction.

The three, all university students with hectic schedules, collected submissions during the fall and edited them through the December exam period. Jason estimates they spent an hour or two on the journal every night for six months.

"It was a bigger commitment then I thought," said Roth, who remembers spending full days working on Gam Yachad.

The journal went through six rounds of editing and "20 different covers or something," by Jason's count, before it was published in March and launched in May at the Jewish Campus Services awards night.

Roth, 19, estimated the cost of producing the book at $13,000. Heather Reisman, of Chapters and Indigo fame, donated $6,500 and later displayed the books in her stores. Other donations came from philanthropist Nancy Pencer, the head of Brain Trust, a private foundation dedicated to improving the quality of life of patients suffering from brain tumors, and from Jewish Campus Services.

Gam Yachad has since been sent to Hillel chapters across Canada and to Jewish organizations that have requested copies.

The trio had several reasons for producing the book. For Jason, 18, and a literature major who just finished his first year at the University of Toronto, compiling a journal had a certain appeal.

The journal's purpose is twofold, he says. It is a way of expressing solidarity with Israel, and it's a place for Diaspora Jews to "feel that they have a safe place to express themselves.

"On campuses like Concordia and York, where there have been those riots, people need a place to feel comfortable and secure. You could call this a safe haven," he says.

Roth, however, was more interested in politics, activism and what Gam Yachad could do for students on campus. His introduction reads like a media relations manual for university student groups.

"The struggle for public opinion with regards to the Middle East conflict is very similar to the efforts that take place during an election campaign," he writes, and makes several points on how to win over public opinion.

Roth speaks from experience. He founded Counterpoint, an inter-campus newspaper about the Arab-Israeli conflict, is vice- president of the Young Zionist Partnership, York's Israel advocacy group, and is the president of the Canadian Alliance at York University.

"It's helpful from a practical perspective because it can inspire people to get more involved on campus with the various groups across the country, or if there isn't one, then start one themselves," says Roth.

The students who contributed to Gam Yachad came from every part of the political spectrum, but uncertainty and terrorism were common themes. In Ari Shomair's story Mideast Microcosm, he imagines what would happen if his roommate were Palestinian. Osnat Steiman dreams about accidentally wearing an Israel Defence Forces shirt in an Arab amusement park in Freud's Israel. Rory Shachter writes about the problems of Zionism, and Karen Born turns Israelis and Palestinians into "little boys who have run their little hands through the hot desert sand."

Right now, Jason and Dalia are planning a second edition. Roth doesn't think he'll edit it because of his other commitments, but he hopes to try his hand at poetry again. Jason wants to include more photos, and possibly some submissions in French. He's hoping Dalia will collect submissions from Montreal when she starts medical school at McGill in September.

Despite the long hours and never-ending edits, they all say Gam Yachad was worth it.

"It was hard. At times we didn't think we'd get through it, but at the end of the day, it's a nice final product," said Roth.

Afterword marks 5th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although the editors of Afterword have pushed the envelope with provocative articles such as Madonna: Truth or Prayer, the national quarterly newspaper aimed at young Jewish adults is "more about how we can reach out to young Jews age 18 to 35 to help educate them and make it fun at the same time," says Dave Gordon, editor and founder of the publication celebrating its fifth anniversary this year.

Gordon and senior editor David Silverberg, a 23-year-old journalism graduate from Ryerson University, often "butt heads," the two said in a joint interview at the Bathurst Jewish Centre cafeteria.

But, Silverberg said, "I can do any article I like, within reason. That's incredible!"

Is there anything they wouldn't run?

Gordon paused. Anything libelous – the easy answer, he said – would be first on the list.

But reflecting on critical letters from left-wing readers in response to a right-wing columnist, Gordon said, "I think one of the things we're dealing with now particularly with what's been going on in Israel is how to talk about the crisis in a fair and balanced way, and at the same time staying pro-Israel.

"That's not to say we wouldn't print something critical of Israel if it's intelligently written and fair."

The free paper, which usually has a print run of 5,000 – depending on budget – can also be found on the Internet at www.afterword.ca.

It's come a long way since Gordon used his home computer to print a logo so Afterword could have credibility with interviewees such as Steven Page of the Barenaked Ladies before the first issue appeared in September 1998. But Gordon bemoans the drying up of the funding that helped him get the paper off the ground.

"I find it's very paradoxical and disappointing that in a Jewish community that whines so much about Jewish student apathy, continuity going down the tubes, and kids going off the path and being uninformed, there's this tool that can make Jewish issues of the day accessible to them, and it's surprising that benefactors and sponsors haven't been so responsive."

In addition to seed money from donors, Gordon put in about $5,000 of his own money to get the paper off the ground. In addition to the newspaper itself, Gordon ran annual Jewish student journalism conferences until 2001, attracting participants from across the country.

The work was done at Gordon's home, as some of it still is, but Canadian Jewish Congress

JF&CS social worker says goodbye after 31 years

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Elliott Larman is cleaning out his office, the same one he's had since the Lipa Green building opened in the early 1980s.

After 31 years with Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), he's sad to be leaving a job he loves but pleased that he won't have to do any more paperwork once he finishes with the last few inch-thick files still in his cabinet.

Now Larman jokes that he's been officially forgiven for finishing his paperwork late. "At my retirement dinner, Gordon Wolfe, the director of JF&CS, gave me a stack of memos of deadlines."

The paperwork was the only thing Larman didn't like. Everything else about the job delighted him.

"It doesn't feel like work to me and to the people I work with," he says. "I like being able to help people and make a difference in their lives."

Retiring, however, isn't something he's thrilled about. He calls himself ambivalent; his wife Shirley says "he's not so willing."

Larman is originally from Montreal, where he got a degree in social work from McGill University and worked as a camp director. People still recognize him from his days at Wooden Acres. After Montreal, he moved to Chicago, Denver and finally Toronto.

He arrived at JF&CS in 1972 to head its children's department, but his shining achievement is founding the Bagel Club, a weekly lunch for recovering psychiatric patients and socially isolated people to meet and eat.

"The kosher chicken dinner that JF&CS [gave] him does not reflect his 30 years of service," said daughter Heidi Larman-Brown. "He gets [his clients] seats for the High Holy Days and city seders, he'll shlep them to Niagara on the Lake to go to some theatre show he got tickets for. It's not a glamourous job, especially for a 70-year-old man, but he loves his clients and they love him."

What does he plan on doing now that he's retired? He grins. His daughter gave birth to a son – his first grandchild – last week, and he's made his services as a babysitter available.

"This event is reminding me that the important things in life take place outside your office," he says.

But slowing down isn't on Larman's agenda. He also plans on continuing his private practice of running support groups and seminars for family services in Mississauga, Peel and Etobicoke, is still involved with JF&CS at its downtown branch for the Chai Group and plans to help his wife with her jewelry and antique business.

Larman is adamant that none of what he does or did can be called work. "I've never worked a day in my life," he says.

Bus service to Brooklyn offered to chassidic Jews

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Montreal now has a mainstream company that offers the chassidic community regular bus service to Brooklyn, New York, challenging the only non-mainstream bus line that has been providing the same service for decades.

Late last month, Adirondack Trailways began offering daily scheduled return service from the downtown Voyageur bus terminal to the chassidic enclave of Boro Park. It leaves at 11 p.m. each night, except Friday, and returns at the same time.

Adirondack, however, denies the new line is part of an effort to undermine Tov Travel, known informally as "Hyman's Bus," the almost-daily service to and from Brooklyn that chassidic Jews have been using for 22 years and that Adirondack and Greyhound are currently challenging before the Quebec Transport Commission (QTC).

The Tov Travel buses allow only kosher food on board, have separate seating by gender and depart at the end of daily evening prayers, Shabbat and holidays. Modest dress is also required.

Last fall, a dispute over the buses surfaced publicly after the Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec (SAAQ), the provincial automotive insurance board, received an anonymous complaint that the Tov Travel bus to Brooklyn did not qualify as a "chartered" service.

Adirondack and Greyhound then picked up on the issue and challenged Tov Travel's service before the Quebec Transport Commission (QTC). Tov Travel's bus stopped operating temporarily after the SAAQ stepped in, but has since resumed, pending the conclusion of the commission hearings, which may be months away.

Judy Baum, co-owner of Mazal Travel, the only travel agency authorized to sell Adirondack bus tickets to Brooklyn, said it's only fair that chassidic Jews be offered a choice.

"I hope it works out," she said. "For years, there's been a monopoly."

has provided office space at the Lipa Green Building. Prior to that, Afterword had space in the B'nai Brith Canada building.

Although the publication was originally aimed at the Jewish campus population, Gordon said readership has always been more diverse, judging from feedback he's received. In September 2001, the masthead changed to reflect that, with its new tag line, "Canada's national paper for the young Jewish scene."

The 24-page current issue, summer 2003, highlights Silverberg's interview with Leonard Nimoy about the Star Trek icon's recent controversial book Shekhina, a collection of Nimoy's photographs in which semi-nude women wear Jewish ritual objects.

Other items featured in the 40-page issue include a trio of articles by general manager and staff writer Lindsay Soberano, the paper's only full-time editorial staff member, on Jewish languages, Jewish meditation and even Jewish noses. Also included is an interview with pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes, whose lecture at York University as part of IsraelFest in January was almost cancelled because of pressure from protesters.

Gordon hinted at some new formats for the fifth anniversary issue due out this fall, although the subject mix – including a blend of the serious and the irreverent and Jewish issues and popular culture – will remain similar. Despite his impending marriage and move to New York this month, he expects to continue to oversee the paper and provide assistance, while York University student Aliza Libman will serve as managing editor, a newly created position.

The paper has a rotating roster of some two dozen writers, including a pool of Ryerson journalism graduates whom Silverberg has sought out.

"More writers coming forward would be heartening," he said.

Tank commander now a corporate fraud buster

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Feature

By the time he retired from the Israeli army 15 years ago, Jacob Lapid had amassed an enviable career record. As a colonel in command of a Merkava tank brigade, he often took part in key military operations, some of which he still won't talk about.

In one vintage photo, circa the mid-1980s, he is seated at a staff table during desert maneuvers speaking to Yitzhak Rabin. Next to the former prime minister is Yitzhak Mordechai, who went on to serve as defence minister, while next to Mordechai is another uniformed officer, Ehud Barak.

Lapid, 49, is now a civilian running a different kind of armour-piercing operation. His company, Lapidim (www.lapidim.com), specializes in corporate investigations and corporate intelligence, a sort of corporate fraud squad that uncovers misconduct in the business world.

Lapid was in Toronto recently where he is planning to expand his Israeli-based business in co-operation with a local partner.

For Lapid, as for so many Israeli military veterans, the transition to civilian life and the business world has been made easier by the leadership development and emphasis on strategic thinking that was part of his training in the Israel Defence Force (IDF).

Back in 1973, however, when he was still a raw recruit fresh out of armoured officers school, strategic thinking was something that took place primarily in the ranks above him. As he recalls it, a day before Yom Kippur 1973, he was rushed to the Sinai Desert and put in charge of a small unit of three modified Patton tanks of the 79th Tank Brigade stationed about 80 kilometres east of the Suez Canal.

Israeli intelligence had gotten wind of the planned Egyptian attack, but "they thought it was only to warm up the border, not cross the Suez Canal," he said.

The day after he arrived, however, all hell broke loose. Lapid was ordered to marshal a tank platoon behind the lines and get ready to move up.

In those early hours of the battle, "we were naive, full of confidence in our ability and we underestimated the enemy."

With his platoon of three tanks and one armoured personnel carrier, he ran the gauntlet of commando attacks to join other Israeli forces already deployed at the Canal. Early on, the Egyptians had dropped commandos behind the Israeli lines whose job was to harass Israeli forces. Many of the commandos were Sudanese, Lapid said, recalling they fought bravely, even recklessly.

The unit advanced unscathed, but when they arrived at their destination they were shocked to learn they faced thousands of enemy soldiers, tanks, artillery and more commandos.

Lapid quickly learned that infantry armed with Soviet-built SAGGER anti-tank missiles and rocket propelled grenades, which were new at the time, posed the gravest threat to Israeli armour.

"Many of my friends from tank school and the military academy were killed," he recalled. "I think we had one of the most intense experiences in fighting and leading our unit in the central part of the Canal."

One of the hardest battles occurred early in the war, when a few dozen Israeli tanks stopped hundreds of advancing Egyptian tanks. "We weren't prepared for such a big scale war. One by one, they [other IDF tanks] were hit."

In the end, only his tank remained intact. The Israelis certainly demonstrated much better tank skills than their Egyptian foes, who seemed unable to get the best out of their Soviet-built machines, he said. His unit of three tanks by itself destroyed close to 100 Egyptian tanks. "It was like shooting ducks," he said.

A few days later, after some reckless and overconfident Israeli counter-attacks ended badly, Lapid's unit received orders to lead an offensive assault to create a corridor between Egyptian forces all the way to the canal. Sharon had taken over command of the Suez front and he was determined to switch the IDF from defence to offence.

Reinforced by other units, but still with a total of only 22 tanks, the IDF advanced until confronted at the battle of the Chinese Farm. It was so named after Israeli soldiers found irrigation pipes with Japanese letters, which they mistook for Chinese script. The battle was one of the fiercest of the war.

It still causes Lapid to pause and choke up as he recalls the heavy sacrifice made to punch a hole in the Egyptian line.

By that time, Amram Mitzna, later to become mayor of Haifa and Labor party leader, had been named brigade commander. Under the plan of battle, Lapid's tank unit was to be the point of the spear and lead a key Israeli counterattack ahead of 22 tanks.

"We felt at the time it was a suicide mission... We had to lead the attack against a strong Egyptian position" without air support, he said. "My company commander tells the story that people came to him and asked if they would return to their families."

The assault began at night. "It's something you remember all your life. We crossed a big Egyptian ambush and we penetrated between two big Egyptian armies to make a corridor.

"Tanks usually fight at a distance, but what developed there was a bitter fight, face to face, where Egyptian commandos were trying to climb on the tanks," he said.

"We were fighting like crazy and firing and shooting at very close range." Enemy tanks were so close that when they were hit, "with the explosion you feel you're being hit at the same time."

The IDF suffered high casualties, but the operation proved a success and a turning point in the war. By the time they reached the canal, only four of the original 22 tanks survived. "Our tanks were covered in blood and pieces of flesh," Lapid said.

Lapid's unit was soon reinforced, and with the beefed-up force Israel crossed the canal, catching the Egyptians flat-footed. Lapid's unit was on the outskirts of Ismailiya when a ceasefire was declared.

At the time, Israeli units were only 101 kilometres from Cairo, with an unobstructed route to the Egyptian capital.

In 1994, Jacob Lapid (left) along with fellow IDF veterans, visited battle sites of the Yom Kippur War, including this one at the Suez Canal.

Lapid continued his military career after the war, rising to the rank of tank brigade commander and then going on to serve in the IDF's intelligence unit, where his primary responsibility was fighting terrorist groups.

For the past 15 years, he's been in the civilian sector working in the field of corporate security.

The IDF, he said, 'is the best preparation, experience, knowledge. You learn to break and penetrate organizations of terror and of money-laundering. The criminal world is similar to the terrorist world because they operate in cells, illegally and secretly."

Corporate commandos be forewarned.

Hamilton woman raises thousands for kosher food bank

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — When a financial crisis hit the local Kosher Food Bank recently, a Jewish Social Services caseworker solved the problem by singlehandedly raising $16,000 in just over two weeks.

Bea Matchen, who has been working for Jewish Social Services for the past 20 years, initiated a campaign to rescue the financially troubled food bank by canvassing the local community.

When Carol Krames, the agency's director, pointed out that the food bank was $9,000 in debt and that they might have to consider applying for a bank loan, Matchen began her own fund-raising campaign.

"I went through the Hadassah phone directory [listing Jews in the Hamilton area] and called people who I thought might want to help, and who would be able to help to some degree," Matchen said.

"I told everyone that this was a one-time campaign and that we give people food, not money. I said that we just couldn't turn people down when they come for food. I was absolutely overcome by the response that I received.

"People said, 'Thank you for giving me the opportunity to help.'"

A local businesswoman donated $5,000.

"She didn't even hesitate," Matchen said.

The Kosher Food Bank gives food to 30 families on a regular basis. It also serves single mothers and people who have short-term financial difficulties.

"Sometimes people come on hard times for a short period when they are out of work," Matchen said. "People have to pay so much for living accommodations that they often don't have enough money for food."

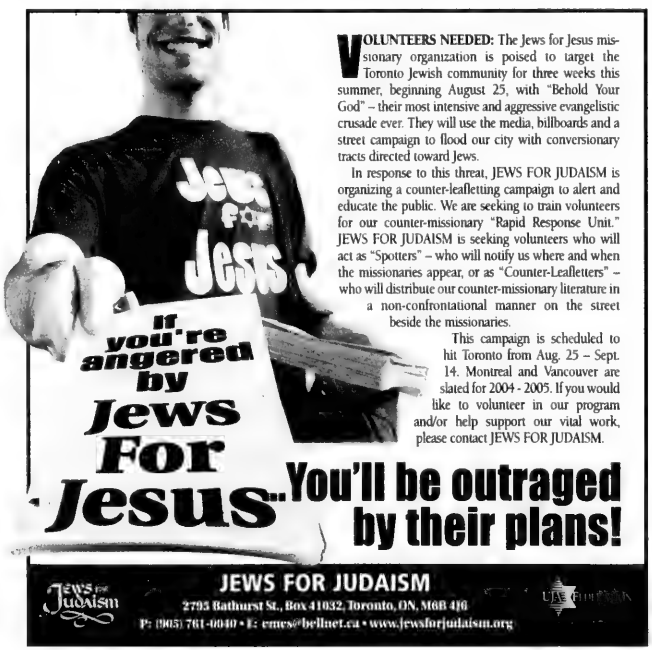
Some people Matchen called were amazed that a kosher food bank was so desperately needed.

"There are those who just can't believe that this can happen in the Jewish community," Matchen said.

The food bank provides vouchers to the local kosher butcher shop and local kosher delicatessen and leaves non-perishable items for pickup at the Jewish Community Centre.

"A separate entrance to the JCC enables people [carrying bags of food] to slip out of the building without the possibility of running into someone they know."

The Kosher Food Bank is a service offered by the Jewish Social Services of Hamilton, an agency of UJA Federation. The agency also runs daytime English as a second language courses for adults, counselling programs for members of the community who might be in crisis, visitation to isolated and hospitalized people, and support for newcomers to the community.



VOLUNTEERS NEEDED: The Jews for Jesus missionary organization is poised to target the Toronto Jewish community for three weeks this summer, beginning August 25, with "Behold Your God" – their most intensive and aggressive evangelistic crusade ever. They will use the media, billboards and a street campaign to flood our city with conversionary tracts directed toward Jews.

In response to this threat, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafletting campaign to alert and educate the public. We are seeking to train volunteers for our counter-missionary "Rapid Response Unit." JEWS FOR JUDAISM is seeking volunteers who will act as "Spotters" – who will notify us where and when the missionaries appear, or as "Counter-Leafletters" – who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner on the street beside the missionaries.

This campaign is scheduled to hit Toronto from Aug. 25 – Sept. 14. Montreal and Vancouver are slated for 2004 - 2005. If you would like to volunteer in our program and/or help support our vital work, please contact JEWS FOR JUDAISM.

Hebrew Academy undergoes changes

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — As Rivka Shaffir prepares to take over the position as principal of Hamilton Hebrew Academy, she says her primary concern is the "total child."

For her, that means students' individuality must be nurtured by the school as well as by their parents, the Jewish community and the world at large, Shaffir said in an interview.

"We want the children to be first and foremost comfortable with themselves and have a very strong sense of their heritage and their roots so they can carry that with them as they go out into the world," she said.

Shaffir, who is currently the academy's vice-principal, has taught grades 7 and 8 since 1972.

She said she plans to maintain what she regards as the school's well-established focus on the child in his or her total environment. She wants to continue to provide a warm, caring and safe community for the students, but this cannot be done in isolation, she said.

Shaffir replaces Frank Samuels, formerly of South Africa, who became principal in November 2001. Rabbi Zev Eisenstein held the job from 1973 to 2001.

Samuels is leaving to become principal of Bnei Akiva Schools of Toronto, which consists of Yeshiva Or Chaim, a high school for boys, and its twin girls school, Ulpanat Orot.

Joining Shaffir in running the academy will be Mary Martha Starkman, the new vice-principal. Starkman, a former teacher at the academy, was more recently the enrichment specialist and co-ordinator of the general studies at Netivot HaTorah Day School in Toronto.

Shaffir and Starkman, who have known each other for 15 years, anticipate a close working relationship.

"It will be a challenge to build on the foundation of excellence at the school," Starkman said.

"We will focus on continuing the tradition of providing both an excellent secular and Judaic studies education as well as on expanding the curriculum and programming."

Shaffir said Hamilton Hebrew Academy is traditional and Judaic studies are delivered from that perspective.

"We have wonderful role models in terms of teachers and rabbis," she said.

The academy welcomes students who come from non-traditional backgrounds and provides them with an enriching experience, she said.

Shaffir said she is delighted when children of former graduates begin their academic careers at the academy.

"It's exciting to see their offspring come here and bloom…

"There is tremendous warmth at the academy. When the kids graduate, they look back on their years here with such fondness."

Before coming to Hamilton, Samuels was principal of the Bnei Akiva-affiliated Yeshiva College of South Africa.

He said he is excited about the challenge of heading another Bnei Akiva school, but will miss Hamilton Hebrew Academy.

"It takes three or four years for a principal to make a school his or her own," he said. "Many of the things I've tried to do in this school are only beginning to happen now.

"Our pre-school is phenomenal. The teachers have worked as a team and we've had a great year."

As the academy's principal, Samuels organized a trip to New York for the pre-school teachers to observe the city's Hebrew day schools.

"The trip likely changed their outlook on teaching. We reaped the benefit of it."

Other events Samuels organized included a community-wide Lag b'Omer picnic and barbeque that featured fireworks and attracted about 250 people, as well as the community's first South African Shabbat dinner last year, an event that was repeated this past May. About 400 people attended the event that featured a cantor and a choir. Samuels also developed the idea for the school's Teddy Bear's Picnic, an evening celebration held during Chanukah. Children were invited to come to the school with their teddy bears and blankets. Children and teachers alike wore pajamas, and everyone had a wonderful time, he said.

Vancouver school gets $100,000 grant

VANCOUVER, B.C — The Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Vancouver has recently approved an unprecedented $100,000 grant to the Talmud Torah High School capital campaign.

This grant is the largest the foundation has ever awarded to one organization and brings the total grants awarded this year to approximately $250,000.

Garry Zlotnik, foundation chair, said, "This grant demonstrates our foundation's commitment to work with our community partners to make meaningful contributions toward building a strong and vibrant Jewish community here in Vancouver."

The foundation is the central address for planned giving in the Jewish community and manages nearly 200 separate endowment funds worth approximately $13.3 million. Through the growth and stewardship of permanent endowment funds and the distribution of income to a wide range of eligible organizations, the foundation strives to meet the needs of the local community as well as national and international Jewish causes.

Vancouver Talmud Torah High School is a traditional, co-educational, independent day school. It is the only existing Jewish high school west of Winnipeg and currently operates out of temporary space, which it shares with two other educational institutions.

The new high school and community facility is the first of its kind in Vancouver and it will be integrated with the Jewish Community Centre as part of the Harry and Jeanette Weinberg J.C.C. campus. The new facility will offer the children of the local community a Jewish learning and educational experience and environment. The Talmud Torah High School capital campaign has raised more than $17 million towards its $18.3 million goal.

The Jewish Community Foundation has provided funding for 27 organizations this year to support a variety of programs and projects. The JCFGV invites applications for consideration in the fall and spring of each year. Interested applicants are asked to submit a letter of intent outlining their program or project and are then invited to apply if they have met the foundation's funding criteria. For more information regarding the grant distribution process please call foundation associate Rena Cohen at 604-257-5100.

Cautiously, Israelis begin to hope

By MATTHEW GUTMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — The sandbags stacked outside Tel Aviv's Ta'am Café about a year ago – part macabre joke and part security precaution – have been removed, as has the café's guard.

Asked about the changes, Lahav, one of the café's many bare-midriffed waitresses, shrugged. "We feel safer now," she said.

Since Palestinian terrorist groups declared a temporary ceasefire late last month, many Israelis see a sliver of light at the end of the tunnel. Recent weeks have seen increases in consumer activity in Israel, in travel both in Israel and abroad, in employment demand and in real estate transactions, according to a recent report in the Yediot Achronot daily newspaper.

"People are eager to get the conflict behind them, they are clamouring to get Israel's economy back on track," said Dori Shadmon, chair of Israel's leading polling group, Teleseker.

But the rise is not only related to the ceasefire, Shadmon said.

"Consumer confidence – generally the best indication of how the 'nation' feels and thinks – has been climbing steadily since April," he said.

The U.S.-led war in Iraq removed a major threat from Israel, the government was able to pass a new economic austerity program and one of the most stable governments in years has pushed forward the road map peace plan with American backing, Shadmon noted.

Though malls and airports are packed again, "it should be noted that these same people don't have anymore money in the bank than they did before," he said.

But, he added, that may not be important: "The psychological influence is what lifts an economy from the doldrums."

Not everyone agrees.

"I don't buy it," said Rachel Elkins, sitting on the Ta'am Café's bougainvillea-draped patio.

Elkins, who until about a year ago worked for several Israeli-Palestinian peace organizations, believes the apparent progress toward peace in recent weeks "is a political ploy by the United States to get President [George W.] Bush re-elected."

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas is being propped up by Israel and the United States but has little chance of success, she said.

Like many other Israelis, Elkins said she has stopped following the news because it is too depressing.

"Of course there will be more bombings. This hudna feels false, it feels like it has no base," she said, using the Arabic word for ceasefire. "I just don't see it holding for very long."

But in Tel Aviv's Carmel Market, a bastion of right-wing politics, vendors are cautiously optimistic.

"What does either side have to lose at this point?" asked Pini Pitzhadze, re-arranging the nylon underwear on sale in his stall.

He said Israel's policy of assassinating terrorist leaders "broke" the groups.

"Everything changed after we almost took out Rantissi," he said, referring to an assassination attempt last month on Abdel Aziz Rantissi, a top Hamas official. "They came running to the negotiating table hungry to make a deal."

Pitzhadze, who does reserve duty once a year with his infantry unit, doubts much will change for soldiers, despite Israel's recent withdrawal from Bethlehem and most of the Gaza Strip.

"So what? We are out of a corner of Gaza and Bethlehem. What about Jenin and Nablus and Tulkarm?" he asked about the West Bank cities. "I have no illusions about not returning to those places anytime soon."

For vendors like Pitzhadze, consumer confidence is critical. Israelis afraid of terrorism stay away from densely packed open-air markets.

"That is why this has to work this time," he said. "We really need shoppers."

Among Israel's Arab population, sentiment is slightly different. Slumped heavily in his chair in the Al Salam (Peace) restaurant in Nazareth, Manour Fahoum has few kind words for terrorist groups such as Hamas or Islamic Jihad, which he believes ruined his life.

"To hell with all those groups," he said. "This city depends on tourism, and now those murderers have destroyed everything."

Fahoum was a tour bus driver, chauffeuring pilgrims around Israel. Now he does little but sip weak tea at his friend Mahmoud's restaurant.

Chatting among themselves, Mahmoud, Fahoum and their friend Bader said neither Israelis nor Palestinians are "going anywhere," so the time has come to end the conflict once and for all.

"This hudna business is a good start," Fahoum said, "but what is necessary is a sulha," or traditional Muslim reconciliation, "a real peace, not a ceasefire."

Oxford moves against professor

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — An Oxford University professor could be fired after rejecting a graduate student because the student is Israeli.

Andrew Wilkie, a professor of pathology, dismissed an application from Amit Duvshani to work in his laboratory in late June, partly on the grounds the Tel Aviv University student had done his mandatory service in the Israel Defence Forces.

"I am sure you are perfectly nice at a personal level, but no way would I take on somebody who had served in the Israeli army," Wilkie wrote Duvshani in an e-mail that has been widely circulated.

Wilkie accused Israel of gross human rights abuses against the Palestinians, even citing the Holocaust in his argument.

"As you may be aware, I am not the only U.K. scientist with these views, but I'm sure you will find another suitable lab if you look around," the e-mail concluded.

In London, the Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization representing most British Jews, protested to Oxford.

"Oxford University is expected to be a place where ideas are freely upheld and exchanged," board President Henry Grunwald wrote to Sir Colin Lucas, Oxford's vice-chancellor.

"This cannot happen if there remains any scope for refusing to admit or hire someone on the basis of their nationality, religion or race," Grunwald said.

Andy Marks, founder and director of the International Academic Friends of Israel, said such "blatant discrimination against a scientist based on his nationality is a dangerous threat to academic and scientific freedom."

The group was formed to fight a boycott of Israeli academics by British academics, which has been the subject of fierce international debate since it was launched last summer.

Baroness Susan Greenfield, a neurobiologist and director of Britain's Royal Institution, has campaigned against the boycott. She said the controversy over Wilkie's comments underscores the seriousness of the boycott in Britain.

"This will show that it's something that's real," she said. "It's not just a flash in the pan."

Although a British academic union rejected a boycott motion at its annual conference in May by a ratio of two-to-one, "that still means a third voted for it," she noted.

Oxford University was quick to distance itself from Wilkie's move, describing itself as "appalled that any member of its staff should have responded to an inquiry from a potential graduate student in the terms in which Professor Wilkie e-mailed Amit Duvshani."

Wilkie apologized for "any distress" his e-mail caused, and said the inclusion of his "personal opinions" was "wholly inappropriate."

"I entirely accept the University of Oxford's Equal Opportunities and Race Equality Policies," he said in a public statement.

Despite Wilkie's apology, Oxford convened a special disciplinary committee on July 4. The Visitatorial Board, as it is called, has the power to recommend that Wilkie be dismissed. It could also recommend a lighter punishment, such as a warning.

Wilkie has four weeks to present his case in writing to the committee, consisting of four Oxford staff members chaired by an outsider. He has the right to appear before the board and will not take part in selecting Oxford students or staff while it is considering the case.

Only one other Visitatorial Board has been convened at Oxford in the past year, a university spokesperson said.

The Board of Deputies welcomed Oxford's move, saying it was "gratifying to hear that the case is being taken so seriously."

Wilkie did not respond to requests for comment.

But Sue Blackwell, a boycott supporter who teaches in the English department at the University of Birmingham, said Wilkie's apology should be the end of the matter.

"I understand that Prof. Wilkie has now apologized to the student and withdrawn his original position of refusing him a place in his lab," she said via e-mail.

"I don't see what he had to apologize for in the first place, but especially in view of his apology, it is completely unacceptable that the University of Oxford should be considering disciplinary action against him," she added.

Blackwell, who proposed the boycott motion that the academic union rejected this spring, highlighted the fact that Wilkie referred specifically to Duvshani's army service in rejecting him.

"This is an important issue because doing military service involves supporting the occupation either directly or indirectly, and for this reason a growing number of young Israelis are refusing to do their initial period of service or to become reservists," she said.

"Israelis who have not done military service are unlikely to be considered for most jobs, which thus excludes most Israeli Arabs as well as the 'refuseniks,'" she said. "So this single act of 'discrimination' against a student who has done his military service in Israel has to be seen in the context of the institutional discrimination in Israel against anyone who has not done military service."

Waiting for a miracle

By ANNA MORGAN

Analysis

Travellers walking north through almost 1,115 feet of underground tunnels beneath the Muslim Quarter in the Old City of Jerusalem might think they're simply learning about events that marked the building of the Western Wall in the Roman era.

But they're also venturing into contemporary politics that surround the Temple Mount and Wall.

On the last Friday in June, I joined a group of haredi and modern Orthodox Israeli families on the last tour through the Western Wall tunnels before Shabbat. As the group lingered to touch the 10-ton cornerstones of the wall that Herod built 2,000 years ago, a question was posed about the history that is currently unfolding and the status of Jerusalem in the U.S.-sponsored road map peace plan.

"Who will this belong to, that is if there is peace?" a man asked.

During the Oslo peace talks, a vertical division of sovereignty was proposed in which everything above the ground would be controlled by the Muslims and everything below it would be controlled by the Jews.

"It all belongs to the Jewish people," a haredi man quickly responded. "God gave this land to the Jewish people and we are holding it, all of it, until the Jewish people are ready to return."

As I emerged from the tunnels, it struck me that while the mainstream Zionist movement accepted the notion of partition of the land of Israel some time in the 1930s, the partition idea has clearly not been accepted by everyone in Israel.

Yet, for most Israelis I met – from left to right – the dream of partition and peaceful coexistence seemed idyllic, but not achievable.

Israelis appear to have redefined their future. The optimism and vision that once propelled the Oslo peace process and is now driving the current road map discussions has been replaced by a general sense of despair.

"The road map is a wish list, which will probably fail," said Shlomo Avineri, the renowned Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor of political science.

His experience as one of the Oslo negotiators has left him feeling "there will not be peace until the Palestinian leadership recognizes Israel's legitimate right to exist."

At this point, he believes, the most that can be achieved is "stabilization."

New Republic writer Yossi Klein Halevy is also pessimistic about the long-term prospects for peace. Unprecedented levels of hatred have emerged among a generation of Palestinians, he said, because they have spent a decade in an education system controlled by the Palestinian Authority and its president, Yasser Arafat.

Klein Halevy, author of the book At the Gates of The Garden of Eden, which emphasizes religious commonalities, said he believes there will be change, but that it will only come through war.

"It will be the hawks who will bring about the vision of the doves," Klein Halevy said.

Other Israelis I spoke to called for a wall between Israel and the Palestinians and demanded that it be built as high as possible – as if a complete division of peoples could somehow compensate for the betrayal they feel over the shattered Oslo accords and the terrorism that has followed. To them, the only question that seemed worth debating was where the wall should be built.

And then there were some who, despite the numbers of willing suicide bombers and the growth of Islamic terrorist organizations, are willing to believe there is hope.

The director of the American Jewish Committee, Eran Lerman, said that totalitarianism has been destroyed in the rest of the world, and he is convinced that eventually it will also collapse in the Middle East.

He takes hope in small things. For example, Lerman notes that, in Aqaba, Mahmoud Abbas spoke of the historical suffering of the Jewish people. It was a statement he was not expecting from the PA prime minister.

As the road map moves forward, I can't help but think of a lecture by Hebrew University scholar Mordecai Abir, who recalled that one month before slain Egyptian president Anwar Sadat came to Jerusalem to meet with former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, he gave a talk predicting that no Arab leader would ever come to Israel.

Greater miracles have been known to happen in the Middle East.

No evidence SS guard lived in Canada: RCMP

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The RCMP says it has uncovered no evidence that a former Nazi death camp guard arrested recently in Michigan ever lived in Canada.

Although recent media reports indicate Johann Leprich, 78, may have spent much of the last 16 years in Windsor, there is no convincing evidence that was ever the case, said Jean Dube, head of the RCMP section in the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

Dube said the RCMP looked into Leprich's whereabouts on three separate occasions since he was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 1987. The national police force uncovered no solid evidence he was ever in Canada, Dube said, though he added he could not rule out that possibility.

"As far as the number of times he came to Canada, it's difficult to say. We have not been able to establish that he lived in Canada," Dube stated.

Leprich was arrested two weeks ago at his home in Clinton Township, 40 kilometres north of Detroit, after U.S. law enforcement agencies acted on a tip.

Officials said Leprich, who served as an armed guard at the Mauthausen concentration camp, was found hiding in a secret compartment under the stairs of his home.

Pointing to that fact, Dube said U.S. authorities "found him in his residence. If he had a secret compartment in his house, it appears he was there all along. Right now, it's speculation as to how often he came" to Canada.

Dube acknowledged Leprich likely did occasionally visit relatives in Canada, but there is no way of knowing how often or how long he stayed.

Although Leprich's name was placed on the Canadian Police Information Centre database, he could have bypassed scrutiny by driving into Canada as a passenger in someone's car and not be asked to prove his identity, Dube said.

Last week, a report in the Detroit News quoted unnamed American "authorities" saying they suspected Leprich "used fake identification to sneak across the U.S.-Canadian border." JTA, meanwhile, quoted Eli Rosenbaum, director of the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, saying, "We caught him on a visit."

The RCMP did look into the Leprich case in 1987, when a U.S. judge first stripped him of his citizenship. In 1997, New York investigator Steven Rambam resurrected the case by attempting to track down Leprich in Windsor (he didn't find him). That same year, Leprich was profiled on America's Most Wanted. The RCMP investigated the Leprich case at that time and once again this year.

"Once he skipped the United States, from that time to now I think the trips [to Canada] were few and far between," Dube said. "He was a fugitive."

The Detroit News reported that Leprich's underground life forced him to remain in hiding most of the time. When he ventured outside, usually at night, he looked closely at people passing by and reacted nervously to unusual sound and movements.

Neighbours said they last saw him in 1987, when he fled federal authorities.

Leprich was living with his wife, Maria, when he was found.

He served as an armed SS Death's Head guard at Mauthausen in 1943 and 1944. An estimated 119,000 prisoners, 38,120 of them Jews, were killed in the camp.

Eye on Arts

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART II: CONVERSATION WITH NANCY RICHLER

Winner of this year's Jewish Book Award for fiction, Vancouver writer Nancy Richler spent five years writing the novel Your Mouth Is Lovely, a tale set in Russia around the time of the 1905 revolution. (It's "a grand and lyrical saga of family secrets and sorrows set in turn-of-the-century Russia," according to the colourful prose on the back cover of the HarperFlamingo paperback edition.)

Richler, who grew up in Montreal and holds a master's degree in history and politics, set much of the book in a few shtetls in a swampy backwater in southeastern Belarus, upriver along the Dnieper from Chernobyl. But the action swings from Kiev to Siberia as its imprisoned narrator, Miriam, tells her life story by letter to her young daughter, who was taken from her at birth and brought by an aunt to Canada.

Nancy Richler

Since writing a novel is supposed to be a voyage of self-discovery for an author, it's not surprising that Richler began writing about herself before she had any strong idea of theme, setting or story for the book.

"I started out by writing about the circumstances of my own birth," she said. "As I was rewriting it, I found I was writing in what seemed like a 19th-century voice... things don't always go the way you expect. So then I decided I wanted to write about my family's origins, not just my origin. That brought me to eastern Europe, just before the turn of the 20th century."

By way of research, she read "everything I could get my hands on – first-person memoirs, travel guides and other books" about the period and place she had chosen, which was "a little more out of the mainstream" than the areas from which her own ancestors had originated. "My father's family was from Galicia and my mother's side were Litvaks," she said, noting that her grandfather had arrived in Montreal about 1903.

Working through Toronto literary agent Dean Cooke, Richler sent sample chapters of the completed novel last year to the American publisher Ecco (an imprint of Harper), and an editor called immediately to request the entire manuscript. "We sent it out on a Friday and we had a sale on a Monday morning," she recalled. "It was wonderful."

She said is "delighted and honoured" to have won the prestigious fiction prize last month. "All the way along, since the book came out, the response from the Jewish community has been incredible. It's just been a wonderful experience for me from the get-go, and this prize is just the icing on the cake."

Your Mouth Is Lovely has been translated into several European languages, and its author recently returned from a promotional tour in Italy. "The book is doing really well in Italy. I did a talk at the Jewish Museum in Venice and they're doing a dramatization of part of it in Bologna. They've invited me to come back for that."

Didn't the Italians, several years back, also heartily embrace Mordecai Richler's novel Barney's Version?

"Oh yes, they've loved Barney – you can't put it into the same category."

Speaking of the more famous Richler, who died two years ago this month, Nancy explained that the families are related but have had little contact.

"There were two brothers who came over, and one had nine children and one had 14. My father is one of the nine children and Mordecai is a son of one of the 14. I know family members from that side, but we didn't interact when we were growing up."

Success Story: Toronto author Kathy Kacer's third Holocaust book for young readers, The Night Spies, was recently published as the fourth title in the Second Story Press's award-winning series of Holocaust Remembrance Books for Young Readers.

As it happens, Kacer wrote two of the three previous books in the series – The Secret of Gabi's Dresser and Clara's War. In an acknowledgement, she paid special tribute to publisher Margie Wolfe for taking "a chance on an unknown author. I am forever indebted and grateful to Margie for her encouragement and her ongoing enthusiasm. She launched my writing career and has continued to support it."

Reached at Second Story's office on lower Bathurst Street, Wolfe reported that The Secret of Gabi's Dresser went into its seventh printing recently and that Kacer is now happily at work on a fourth book.

Wolfe also waxed eloquent about the success of another title in the series – Hana's Suitcase, by Karen Levine. The book has won multiple major prizes, reached a huge non-Jewish market, and sold more than 100,000 copies in Japan alone. According to Wolfe, a British reviewer recently compared it to another classic of Holocaust literature – none other than The Diary of Anne Frank.

Rock musician turns to flamenco

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

James Cohen stopped playing guitar professionally at 21, but after jamming with a flamenco musician more than a decade later, the former rock 'n' roller came away with a renewed interest in music and a desire to play flamenco.

Cohen became a jeweller after he "retired" from rock music. On a gem-buying trip in Venezuela in the early 1990s, he played with the flamenco musician at a local tapas bar.

"A highly annoying friend of mine forced me up on stage to play with him," Cohen says. "It was a lesson in humiliation I shall never forget. Since that day, I have been fascinated, and determined to play flamenco."

Back home in Ottawa, Cohen began studying flamenco while continuing his job as a jeweller. At a jewelry store he owned for a while, he practised guitar when he could.

Cohen, 43, says his rock background was of little help in mastering flamenco techniques. As a rock guitarist, he had, most notably, worked with the late Mick Ronson, who has been credited with shaping the sound of David Bowie's early recordings.

James Cohen

Nevertheless, Cohen says he had to unlearn habits he had picked up from playing rock. The only similarity between playing rock and flamenco, he observes dryly, is that there are "neural connections between the brain and the fingers."

Cohen says anyone who has the potential to play guitar well or anyone who can already play well, regardless of his or her musical style, can learn how to play flamenco.

But he says he found it hard to learn the music's complex rhythms. He went to music stores in search of a drum machine or a synthesizer that would help him, but found nothing. So with software engineer Mike Lester, Cohen put together a prototype metronome for flamenco and world music (including classical Indian, Latin American, Caribbean and Middle Eastern), the VKO MundoBeat. He says it was easier to invent the MundoBeat than to try to learn to play flamenco on his own.

Seeing an opening in the market, Cohen ordered 1,200 units of the MundoBeat, set up a Web site, www.vko.com, and left the jewelry business. By March 2001, he had sold all $99 units and he is now powering up the company again with new stock ready to be shipped to customers and music stores around the world.

"It will be a long time before the company makes any money," Cohen says. "Basically, it's a labour of love."

Initially, he expected that most of his customers would be students, but it turned out that some experienced musicians also found the MundoBeat useful. The Web site includes endorsements from well-known flamenco musicians such as Miguel De La Bastide, Ottmar Liebert, Jesse Cook and Tomatito.

Cohen's third CD, the critically acclaimed High Side of Lowdown, which was released recently on NorthernBlues Music, includes flamenco as well as blues and Gypsy jazz tunes. Hints of Cohen's rock roots can be heard on some of the tracks and the recording was produced by Richard Bell, Janis Joplin's former piano player. In addition to producing, Bell also plays keyboard, piano, vibraphone and accordion, while Tony D. plays guitar, Devin Johnstone does percussion and Stu Watkins plays bass.

Cohen got his first taste of flamenco and Gypsy music on visits to his great-uncle's when he was six.

"My father would bring me to visit his aunt and uncle on Sundays," he says. "My uncle was considered quite eccentric and he listened to this unusual Gypsy music.

"He had an extensive collection of old wax flamenco recordings and while the family chatted, I was in the living room listening to it."

Cohen says the tunes on High Side of Lowdown, "which are both widely varied and unified with the same roots," have a feel that can still take him back to his uncle's living room.

Cohen performs in Ottawa at The Rainbow Bistro on Aug. 1 and Aug. 28 and The Mercury Lounge on Aug. 6.

Posthumous donation funds Tay-Sachs research

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although the percentage of people carrying the gene for Tay-Sachs disease is higher among Ashkenazi Jews than in the general population, it's a misconception that Tay-Sachs is a Jewish disease.

Marla Fine, a board member of the National Tay-Sachs & Allied Disease Association of Ontario, which focuses on family support, wants to get that message across. Fine and her husband, Bob Gagné, who is not Jewish, had a daughter, Elizabeth, who died of Tay-Sachs in 1995 at age four.

Gertie and Jack Uger, Cheryl and Len Goldberg, along with Fine, sat around the Ugers' Toronto breakfast table recently to discuss the disease.

The two couples, whose children were not affected by Tay-Sachs, crossed paths with Fine after Jack and Cheryl were named executors for the estate of their uncle, Louis Uger, a Hamiltonian who wanted them and their spouses to allocate his entire estate – a substantial amount of money that the couples prefer not to specify – to fund Tay-Sachs research.

The disease that claimed his only child in 1953 leads to mental and physical deterioration. Children with Tay-Sachs appear healthy at birth, but rarely survive beyond five years of age.

Arlene Sarah Uger – her parents always referred to her by her first and middle names – was only three years old when she died in 1953. She is remembered by her relatives as a pretty child with dark hair and long eyelashes.

Her father began talking about her again only in recent years, before his death at age 87 in 2001, said Cheryl, whose late aunt, Belle Uger, was Louis' wife.

The two Toronto couples have made significant donations to the Hospital for Sick Children (HSC) and the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, as per their uncle's request.

Gertie did most of the legwork, even calling a contact in Israel to see what type of Tay-Sachs research was being done there. It was through the Weizmann organization here, though, that she learned about research being done by Tony Futerman in Israel.

Futerman is working on finding the reason for nerve cell dysfunction in a variant of Tay-Sachs. He was recently in contact with fellow scientists at HSC as a result of the donation.

"That's a really crucial thing – bringing the scientists together," said Fine.

At HSC, scientist Don Mahuran has been the principal investigator in Tay-Sachs-related research that the Ugers are now helping fund.

Tay-Sachs is one of a series of so-called lysosomal diseases in which a crucial enzyme is not delivered to the part of the cell where it has to go to do its work, explained John Callahan, HSC's genetic metabolic laboratory director and a research collaborator of Mahuran's. Without that enzyme, material builds up in cells affecting the central nervous system.

They are working on finding a "chemical chaperone" to deliver the enzyme in certain types of Tay-Sachs disease. Results with lab mice thus far are promising, said Callahan, although the implications are greater for one variant of Tay-Sachs and for related diseases including Gaucher's disease than for infantile Tay-Sachs.

"A donation like this really does make a difference," said Fine.

Although testing is available to determine whether adults are carriers for Tay-Sachs and related diseases like Familial Dysautonomia and Canavan disease – and recommended for high-risk groups, including the Ashkenazi Jewish population and some French Canadian and Acadian populations – Fine said it would unnerve her if "it got to the point where everyone had to be tested.

"I can't tell you I wish I was tested because that's like saying I wish Elizabeth had never been born. I also think of the giggles, the laughs and the joy."

A lot of people think that, because of the prevalence of testing, Tay-Sachs is a disease that has been beaten, said Fine. "It isn't." She hopes to see a cure.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have been taking a supplement for low iron prescribed by my doctor, but I feel nauseous frequently. Is this because my iron is low?

A. Feeling nauseous is likely a symptom of the iron supplement, not of having low iron. Many iron supplements can make you feel queasy. But the only way to improve your iron levels is by taking that supplement as prescribed, so revisit your doctor and tell him or her your symptoms. Other supplements can be prescribed that will likely be better tolerated. Also try taking the supplement on a full stomach, such as after dinner or before bed. This is also true for maternity vitamins, which also contain a high amount of iron.

Q. My teenage daughter does not consume many dairy products and her pediatrician suggests she take a calcium supplement. Can you recommend one?

A. Because of the health benefits of dairy foods, I am reluctant to encourage someone who can tolerate dairy products to resort to a calcium supplement. Calcium is only one important component in dairy foods. If you can encourage your daughter to eat cheese, yogurt, chocolate milk, ice cream, milkshakes or smoothies, then you can add a supplement as well to ensure she is meeting her calcium needs at a peak bone-building stage.

As far as a supplement goes, choose a calcium-magnesium combination in a 2 to 1 ratio, which you can find in health food and drug stores and which allows excellent absorbability.

Q. I am commited to improving the fruit and vegetable intake in our house this summer. Can you tell me some of the most nutritious, kid-friendly ones?

A. "Kid-friendly" is in the eye of the beholder. The most important thing is not that you serve healthy foods, but that your family actually eats them. Try cantaloupe, blueberries, sweet potatoes, avocado, red and green peppers, broccoli and watermelon, which are all nutrient powerhouses.

Q. My three-year-old is very constipated. What foods should I give him to help his regularity?

A. It is important that you not only consider which foods are necessary to give to your child, but also which foods might need to be reduced as they may worsen constipation. These foods include bananas and dairy and white rice products.

Which foods you add depends on your child's likes and dislikes and the severity of the constipation. First check with your child's doctor, who may prescribe a laxative, particularly if your child is uncomfortable or has gone for a prolonged period of time without having a bowel movement.

The most important thing to add is fluids – anything from water to prune juice. Also try high-fibre foods such as oatmeal, bran cereals, breads or muffins, dried fruit, fresh fruit and vegetables, legumes (beans), whole wheat pasta, corn and whole grain crackers. When buying whole wheat foods, make sure the ingredients actually list whole wheat flour. Good luck.

Israel toughens stance on Iran's nuclear program

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is demanding that the international community bring enriched uranium production in Iran to a complete halt, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom will tell European leaders.

Israel earlier supported the demand that Iran sign the additional protocol of the Nuclear Proliferation Treaty (NPT) that would lead to tighter nuclear inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). Iran is under international pressure to increase the transparency of its nuclear program and accept international supervision to ensure the work is used for peaceful purposes – as the Iranians say – rather than for the development of nuclear weapons.

Tehran indicated under pressure that it would accept the additional protocol, which was introduced after the 1991 discovery of Iraq's secret atomic weapons program. The protocol would give the IAEA access to more information about Iran's nuclear activities and the right to carry out inspections on short notice.

Iranian President Mohammed Khatami hosted IAEA director Mohamed El Baradei last week and said Iran views the additional protocol "positively," but wants further clarification. An IAEA team will be dispatched this week to clarify Iranian concerns over tighter nuclear inspections.

Israeli experts believe that tightening international nuclear inspection without imposing restrictions on the Iranian project is dangerous. First, the Iranians can "play for time" in the talks, and even after they sign, the tighter inspection may not be enacted automatically. The Iranians could produce a nuclear bomb under cover of the extended talks with the IAEA.

Secondly, the experts said, in exchange for signing the protocol, Iran will demand an international agreement allowing it to continue producing enriched uranium, thus continuing the nuclear project under seeming transparency.

The European Union recently decided that as a condition for negotiations for a new trade agreement with Iran, the openness and transparency of the Iranian nuclear program must be improved.

Officials in Jerusalem expressed satisfaction with the plan presented about three weeks ago by EU foreign policy and security chief Javier Solana to halt the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Club named for Moses, the original 'outdoor Jew'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Some stereotypes die hard.

Like the one about the world's smallest book – about famous Jewish athletes.

Or the one that says Jews are bookish, indoor creatures who just don't cope well in the great outdoors.

Wrong.

Across North America and right here in Toronto, Jewish outdoor clubs have sprung up in the last few years that offer members a congenial group environment in which to hike, bike and trek.

Brenlee Robinson is living proof, along with countless others, that Jews can thrive in the outdoors.

As president of the Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario, Robinson acknowledges that the club's very existence comes as a surprise to some. "People who find the club are so astonished that there's a Jewish outdoors club, they go out and tell others," she said.

Thanks to that word of mouth, and aided by a profile in The CJN back in 1998, the club has grown to substantial proportions. More than 450 people receive the club's regular e-mail updates, while its events attract anywhere from a handful to more than 60.

The Ontario club is associated with a continent-wide collection of 26 similar Mosaic clubs from Miami to Colorado, and they get together at least once a year for a mega-event. Last summer, the Ontario club organized four days of activities in Haliburton, north of Toronto, that saw 200 Americans and 30 Canadians participate.

This year's international event will take place outside Chicago on the Labour Day weekend and will include kayaking, hiking, biking, canoeing and cave exploration. See www.mosaics.org/events/2003 for more details.

Back on the home front, Mosaic members and guests generally get together 25 to 30 times a year for various programs (http://mosaictoronto.org).

In late spring, more than 60 enjoyed a four-hour hike just outside Toronto, and a few weeks later, a smaller group tested their canoeing skills at Palmer Rapids, near Algonquin Park.

Other summertime events include a 20-kilometre hike, an inside-the-city ravine walk, overnight camping trips, cycling tours, indoor rock climbing, weekend rafting excursions, and, during the winter, frequent cross-country ski trips, downhill skiing and skating outings.

About six to eight times a year, the group heads out of town for overnight camping trips, said club member Lynda Bloom.

The first Mosaic Club was founded in 1988 by Steve Harris Millmond in Colorado, under the name Mosaic Outdoor Mountain Club.

As Millmond explains it, the club was named for Moses, the original "outdoor Jew" and was started due to his belief that modern Jews had lost touch with the fact that Judaism was closely linked to the outdoors and the environment. Too many, he said, would rather dine out or go shopping than hike or canoe.

Robinson, a Winnipeg native who learned her outdoor skills at B'nai Brith Camp outside Kenora in northwestern Ontario, said the club also offers a social component. Although it's not a singles club, most members are not attached and they range in age from their 30s to 40s, though with a sprinkling of younger and older participants, she said.

Mosaic member Lynda Bloom (centre, in purple shirt) with other club members and guests during a recent hike.

"The club is a really interesting way to meet people," Bloom said. "It's not a [dating service] environment. You meet interesting people who want to go out and do stuff."

As many as 50 per cent of the club's members are "out-of-towners," including people from Venezuela, France, Poland and other communities in Canada who find the club a good way to meet other Jews, she said.

"You get to know people, how much patience they have, how they handle stress and excitement, what they like to eat," she said. "And there are no interruptions by ringing phones."

ספרותנו

About Ethics and Business

Rabbi Jay Kelman

May one invest in corporations whose activities may be ethically wanting?

Exemplary ethical conduct is mandated in all spheres of activity, including monetary dealings. Furthermore, aiding and abetting unethical conduct of others is akin to actually committing the crime oneself. Thus, it would appear that buying stock in corporations that for example deal in such industries as tobacco or gambling or who have discriminatory labour practices or engage in unfair competition would be proscribed. Similar standards apply to investing in Jewish-controlled companies that operate on Shabbat, though they are not engaged in unethical practices.

However, Torah law only proscribes aiding and abetting if one's actions are necessary for the commission of wrongdoing. If the proscribed action would happen with or without your involvement, no biblical law is violated. However, rabbinic law is violated when one publicly associates with wrongdoing – even if one is not responsible for such behaviour.

With this brief (and incomplete) background, we can draw several conclusions. Joining the board or being part of the top tier of executives of a corporation that engages in unethical practices is forbidden. Similarly, purchasing a controlling or even influential block of shares as might be the case with mutual and pension fund managers, would violate Jewish ethics.

The individual investor would be enjoined from purchasing stock in an initial public offering, but buying small amounts of shares in the secondary market would be allowed. In this typical investment, one is not directly helping the corporation as profits (or losses) on these transactions accrue to the investors themselves. Similarly, investing in a mutual fund where one is often not even aware of what stocks are owned, and is only indirectly investing in the companies themselves, presents few moral issues and would be permitted.

While owning a few shares may technically be permitted, surely a sensitive person would not knowingly invest in company that for example releases cancer-causing agents into the environment. After all, your making money is tied to the company's success at carrying out its unethical practices. Not all that is permitted is recommended.

Grieving mother unhappy with outcome of murder trial

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For 3½ years, Olga Baranovski has carried the pain of the loss of her only son, Matti, who was killed in a brutal attack by a swarming gang of youths over a pack of cigarettes and pocket money.

Last week, with two of the accused convicted of manslaughter and a third, Israeli Daniel Weiz, acquitted, disappointment in the Canadian justice system added to her grief.

"This kind of justice, I don't understand it," she said in a telephone interview. "Somebody had to find the truth. It was a game, not a trial.

"I was thinking the country would help me and support me."

Olga Baranovski

Baranovski was speaking shortly after a jury, following seven days of deliberations, found Meir Mariani and William Cochrane, both 20, guilty of manslaughter while acquitting Weiz, 23. All three had been charged with second degree murder.

The Crown had alleged the three were part of a larger group of masked men who confronted Matti in G. Ross Lord Park on the night of Nov. 14, 1999. The gang had gone to the park looking to settle scores with a group of "Russians" and when they could not find them, they approached Matti and his friends, who were sitting his cigarettes, they set upon him and knocked him to the ground. One of the kicks snapped his head back, severing an artery and causing his death.

Evidence at the trial was often contradictory, as the Crown relied in large part on the testimony of other gang members whose credibility as witnesses was attacked forcefully by defence lawyers.

One key witness who implicated the three accused, Yaviore Lipschitz, at first appeared in court too hungover to testify and later said he had tried to cement his reputation as a tough guy by falsely boasting he had kicked Matti.

Olga Baranovski found the jury's verdict wanting and the entire legal process of little comfort. "I followed the law and what did the law give me? Nothing. No support, no security, nothing."

Now she wonders, "Is it better to grow good children or bad children?"

Even though the perpetrators have been in jail, they get food, medication, health care, she said, "They look so healthy. I look like an old lady, inside and out."

Taking aim at the manslaughter verdict as opposed to a finding of murder, Baranovski said she doesn't agree with the jury's decision. "I don't think they really know what is violence. A jury does not know about the path of violence," she said.

"The jury, if it was their child, their only child, they would not

The News in Brief

Canada

Al-Jazeera Comments

OTTAWA — In response to calls for comment from the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada are expected to argue against plans by Canada's cable companies to import the signal of Al-Jazeera, the Qatar-based Arab news network. They say the network consistently airs anti-Semitic hate speech, but the National Council of Canada-Arab Relations has said it would "broaden the horizon of the Canadian public" on the Mideast. Deadline to submit briefs is Aug. 11.

Rainforest Mission

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee is sending a group of more than 40 volunteers, including aboriginal youth from Toronto and five Israeli teens from the Israel-based Pirchey Refua (Medical Cadets), on a mission to the Guyana rainforest starting Aug. 3. The Israelis will provide first aid and health education, while other group members will offer youth leadership and literacy programs and take part in construction programs and health education.

Israel

Iraq Biz Ties OKd

JERUSALEM — Israeli companies can do business with Iraq after Israeli Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu signed an order last week allowing Israeli firms to invest in Iraq and import and export goods. He made the decision after meeting with Israeli businessmen who wanted to participate in the reconstruction of Iraq after the U.S.-led war.

Tour Guides Sue PA

JERUSALEM — Forty-two Israeli tour guides are suing the Palestinian Authority for lost earnings due to the intifadah. The lawsuit, which seeks more than $12 million (US) in damages, was filed in Jerusalem District Court last month. It says the violence that began in September 2000 has reduced the guides' earnings by 80 per cent and put some out of business entirely. In a similar move, more than 300 flower growers have filed a class action suit demanding more than $30 million (US) in compensation from the government and the PA for lost earnings due to a shortage of workers since September 2000.

Youth Tourism Up

JERUSALEM — After three years of declining educational tourism in Israel, the Jewish Agency for Israel reports 3,000 youths will arrive on JAFI-sponsored "Israel Experience" programs by summer's end, a 100 per cent increase over last year. Before the start of the latest intifadah in September 2000, some 13,000 youth came each summer on the tours.

World

Bombing Marked

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jews marked the ninth anniversary July 18 of the bombing of their main community centre in Buenos Aires. The country's new president, Nestor Kirchner, attended the event and pledged to bring the investigation of the bombing of the AMIA building to an end. Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith also marked the date in Ottawa, Toronto and Winnipeg.

Sobibor Escapee Dies

BRANTFORD, Conn. — A Holocaust survivor who took part in the biggest escape from a Nazi extermination camp in World War II has died. Chaim Engel died July 4 of heart failure following a stroke and pneumonia. He was 87. On Oct. 14, 1943, Engel and his future wife were among 30 survivors out of 300 Jewish prisoners who escaped from the Sobibor concentration camp in Poland. Engel's actions were recounted in greatest detail in Richard Rashke's 1982 book Escape from Sobibor, which was made into a TV movie in 1987.

Restitution Vote

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference voted to maintain its current division of Holocaust restitution money. Meeting last week, Claims Conference officials voted to continue allocating 80 per cent of the $430 million (US) from the sale of unclaimed East German Jewish property to needy Holocaust survivors. The remaining 20 per cent is spent on education, documentation and research. Some survivors' groups had argued that a higher percentage of the money should go to survivors.

Irving Film Canned

MELBOURNE — Organizers of the Melbourne Film Festival cancelled the July 10 screening of a film by Holocaust denier David Irving, The Search for the Truth in History, because of fears of a protest. A tribunal earlier refused a petition to block the screening.

Truman Blasted Jews

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — Former U.S. president Harry Truman called "Jews very, very selfish" in a recently discovered diary. The 1947 entry is based on a conversation with Henry Morgenthau, treasury secretary under president Franklin Roosevelt. Morgenthau was seeking Truman's aid about a Jewish ship in Palestine, and Truman wrote Morgenthau had "no business" to contact him. "The Jews have no sense of proportion nor do they have any judgment on world affairs," Truman wrote. He went on that Jews seek "special treatment." The United States under Truman was the first country to recognize Israel after it declared independence in 1948.

Agudath Israel Condemns Gay Marriage Bill

TORONTO — The Quebec and Ontario arms of the Orthodox group Agudath Israel of America are urging federal MPs to reject proposed legislation that would recognize same-sex unions as marriages.

"Our colleagues in Toronto and Montreal have done a great service in speaking out as forcefully as they did," said Rabbi David Zwiebel, Agudath Israel of America's executive vice-president for government and public affairs.

The group, which says it represents "traditional Orthodox Jews and classical Jewish values," issued a forceful two-page memorandum against the proposed legislation, which comes after an Ontario court ruling recently struck down Canada's longstanding, traditional definition of marriage, and courts in Ontario sanctioned same-sex marriages.

The head of the Orthodox Va'ad Harabonim of Toronto, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, said the Va'ad also does not recognize same-sex marriages, but won't make a formal statement. "We're happy to express an opinion, but we're not in the business of issuing statements on these things," he said.

Community prepares for blitz by missionaries

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

This city's Jewish community is shedding its summer doldrums and girding for what officials fear could be a prolonged and tense confrontation with so-called "Hebrew-Christian missionaries."

Dozens of Jews for Jesus members will descend on Toronto and its Jewish suburbs from Aug. 20 to Sept. 14 for what community leaders say will be a splashy, aggressive and very public drive to convert Jews to evangelical Christianity.

It's all part of Jews for Jesus' Behold Your God campaign, a five-year, $22 million (US) drive launched in 2001 to spread the Christian gospels in 66 cities outside Israel with Jewish populations of 25,000 and more.

"Canada is the fourth country with the largest Jewish population [sic] with approximately 360,000 Jewish people," notes Jews for Jesus' Web site. "Over 160,000 Jews, the majority in Canada, [sic] live in southern Ontario!"

Montreal and Vancouver are said to be targeted for future campaigns. The push has already reached Jews in 22 cities, including Tehran, Istanbul, Minsk, Budapest and Detroit.

Canadian Jewish Congress and Jews for Judaism say the Toronto campaign will be the biggest and most ambitious missionary crusade ever in Canada.

And it could be highly emotional too. Congress will soon meet with police officials in Toronto and York Region to plan strategies on how to avoid physical confrontations between Jews and missionaries.

'Let's hope cool heads prevail'

"It's a huge provocation," says CJC Ontario region director Bernie Farber of the Jews for Jesus campaign. "We're really hoping to avoid violence."

Farber said the atmosphere in parts of Toronto and Thornhill doubtless will be emotionally charged, as Jews for Jesus engage in street evangelism in Jewish neighbourhoods or hand out their tracts near synagogues on Shabbat.

Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group, is calling for a reasonable approach.

"We really feel the Jewish response has to be positive, that we have to stress we are proud of being Jewish," counsels Rabbi Michael Skobac, the organization's educational director. "Rather than lash out, we're hoping people will call us. Let's hope cool heads prevail."

Jews for Judaism has moved into high gear with a multi-pronged plan.

It's mobilizing a cadre of volunteers who will be deployed whenever a Jews for Jesus member is spotted on the street.

"We're getting up to 15 calls a day from people who say they will be available. We're hoping to have a significant pool of volunteers," Rabbi Skobac said.

He said Jews for Jesus volunteers are scheduled to hit the streets Aug. 25. "They're mobilizing a large crew."

Of vital importance, he added, will be to avoid any harassment, or perception of it.

"They have a history of calling the police and accusing us of harassment. The police have always asked us to move. [This time], we'll direct our people not to stand on top of them and to stand several feet away. Our goal is not to harm them."

Up to six training sessions for Jews for Judaism volunteers will take place in early August.

Jews for Judaism has scheduled an all-day "Jewish survival seminar" for Aug. 24 with tips on how to counter Christian missionaries. Several other special lectures and seminars are also planned.

As well, it is asking all rabbis in the city to set aside Sept. 6 as a "Stand Up For Judaism" Shabbat. All pulpit rabbis in the Greater Toronto Area will receive educational and other background material about Jews for Jesus.

A community-wide rally is slated for Sept. 7 featuring a one-time missionary leader who has since converted to Judaism, and Rabbi Bentzion Kravitz, founding director of Jews for Judaism.

Funding cuts threaten Temple Har Zion's 'Out of the Cold' program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Steven Borlak is on a mission to save the "Out of the Cold" programs at Temple Har Zion and seven other locations in York Region after learning the City of Toronto will stop funding them because they're outside its borders.

Borlak, who co-ordinates both the Har Zion program and Mosaic Interfaith, the umbrella organization for the eight houses of worship in York Region that offer food and shelter to the homeless in winter, described the city's decision as "totally illogical" because most of the "guests," as he calls them, come from Toronto.

Since forming its Out of the Cold program five years ago, Mosaic Interfaith has been aided by Out of the Cold Support Services (OOTCSS), a not-for-profit organization that provides it with security, maintenance, transportation to and from the Finch subway station, and some support workers.

Borlak, who has spent hundreds of hours trying to save the program, said the City of Toronto has indicated it will not continue to give OOTCSS the $90,000 needed to support the northern sites.

"That means we will be unable to continue with the programs that run four nights a week during the winter, since we will be without the means to transport our guests to the subway, and we will be without security and maintenance."

After learning of the funding cuts, his first response was to approach the York Region government, "but it suggested that we reconfigure our program so it just attracts York region guests.

"As volunteers, we do not have the social work skills to reconfigure the program," Borlak said. "We are passionate about the program and we have big hearts, but we are not trained."

He said he has also approached the provincial and federal governments, "but they have not been particularly helpful."

In the scheme of things, "$90,000 is not a lot of money. [The city] is being so callous. When I think of the amount of angst this decision has caused, I feel ill," Borlak said.

Although he is confident he can get funding to prepare for the following winter, "if we don't run this year, the whole infrastructure will fall apart, and the guests would think that we were another oasis that has disappeared. We could also lose the commitment of our volunteer base."

In addition to the funds from OOTCSS, each religious institution must raise funds on their own to help provide food, subway tokens and other items needed for the program's operation. "It is difficult to engage in fundraising activities while our situation is so uncertain," he said.

When the program started, Borlak said, the temple set a maximum of 16 overnight guests and 30 guests in total, who were provided with dinner, breakfast and a bagged lunch to take with them.

"Unfortunately, business is thriving. If we could put homelessness and isolation on an index on the stock market, I would recommend it as a good buy.

"Over this past year, we served dinners to numbers in excess of 70 per night and up to 26 overnight guests per night. Because of our tight physical configuration, we turned away at least five to 10 guests per night," he said.

The Mosaic programs provide a calming environment for those who usually stay at overcrowded shelters in Toronto, Borlak said.

"Our programs are non-invasive and non-judgmental. We do not preach to the guests and we do not permit proselytizing. While we commit to providing the basic physical needs of shelter, food and clothing, we believe that the bigger issue is to respond to the human needs of compassion, dignity and feelings of self worth," he said.

While a small number of guests demonstrate obvious emotional or mental instabilities or debilitating addictions, and some are content to live off the goodwill of others, "a troubling component consists of people that are educated and accomplished, people who have fallen through the cracks and are unable to climb out," Borlak said.

"I look at them and I realize that I could be looking at a parent, a sibling, a child or even myself. Until there are better solutions, we choose to look after as many people as we can. What could feel better than to welcome strangers into your spiritual home for physical sustenance and compassion?"

Year since murder 'a struggle,' Chavie Rosenweig says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It has been a year since the Toronto Jewish community was rocked by the murder of David Rosenzweig. For his widow, Chavie, and their six children, "This year has been, and continues to be, a journey and a struggle."

She recognizes, she said, that she is now the captain of the ship that is the family. "I have to create a positive and healthy home. I set the tone."

It's a huge responsibility, she mused, adding "but it's my responsibility."

'Strange to realize that David isn't at the head of the table'

Her six children – Meir, Sholom, Ezra, Shraggie, Yechiel and Shira, who is married and a mother herself– are all very protective of her, she said. "They have realized that we have to work together to make our life work.

"It's still so strange to realize that David isn't at the head of the table at Shabbat or yom tov," she said in an interview at her home.

The dignity Chavie has been noted for since the murder belied the anguish in her eyes as she spoke, as did her constant twisting of a napkin into a tighter and tighter spiral.

She told The CJN she feels blessed by the kindness and support she has received from so many people: her immediate and more distant family, as well as friends, rabbis, social workers, psychologists, schools, yeshivas, lawyers, David's former business associates and total strangers.

She said Detroit psychologist Robert Fink, whose father was murdered; Esther Wachsman, mother of Nachshon Wachsman, who was kidnapped and murdered by Arab terrorists; and the Mandel family, whose son Koby was also a victim of terrorism in Israel, have all helped in the the healing process.

There is a special bond between those who have lost a loved one through violence, Chavie said.

"We speak the same language," she said. "We are the walking wounded. We share emotions and fears that only we can understand. Our sense of security in the world around us has been destroyed."

And there is a man she calls Fred, who on his own takes care of the flowers that form a memorial to David on the spot where he was killed. "[Fred] put everything in a specific design – an incomplete circle – and makes sure that the candle never goes out."

The Jewish community is honouring David's memory in a number of ways, including the UJA Federation David Rosenzweig Fund for Victims of Terror, a lecture series at Chabad@Flamingo and a fall mission to Israel that will present Torahs and portable shuls to the Israel Defence Forces.

All these efforts, Chavie said, "keep David alive in a meaningful way, honouring his love of Israel, learning, family, and just people."

After the murder, she looked for ways to keep her faith in God, to find a way to carry on. She tried to connect with people "who live Torah, not just learn Torah," including historical figures, such as King David, who maintained their faith even through great difficulties.

David Rosenweig

For a while, Chavie said, she wasn't able to open a siddur or to pray at all. Finally, she said, a rebbitzen she knew told her there are many ways to pray, and one way is through hardship, grief and anguish.

"She told me that you can be at the sink washing dishes, and the tears start pouring down your face – that's your prayer. You are always connected, although it may be at a different level."

Those who haven't felt such pain can't imagine what a comfort that was, Chavie said.

She was particularly struck by a passage in Psalms that describes God as the father of orphans and the protector of widows. "I felt that that message was meant for me."

She said that if you look for the hand of God, you will see it everywhere: in the kindness of strangers; in representatives of Zaka, the Israeli organization that collects blood and other body parts of terror victims, who happened to be in Toronto at the time of the murder and went to the site and did their holy work for the first time outside of Israel; and in the visit of Danny Brom, the director of the Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma at Jerusalem's Sarah Herzog Hospital, who was in town later to raise funds for the centre and made time to come to the house and counsel the family.

The entire Rosenzweig family has undergone much counselling and therapy to help them deal with what happened, and they are all coping in their own way, Chavie said.

The preliminary hearing to decide whether the man arrested for David's murder will be tried is scheduled to begin in September, and Chavie said she intends to be there.

"It will be hard," she said. "It will open everything up again."

Visibly gathering her self control together, she added: "We have to recognize that we [the family] represent the Jewish people, whether we want to or not."

Autism therapy for kids a financial burden, court told

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Tammy Starr considers it a miracle that her daughter Carly Fleishmann, 8, signed her own name to a letter from camp this summer.

She credits applied behavioural analysis (ABA), a therapy program for children with autism, for Carly's recent development.

The therapy, which can cost up to $50,000 a year, uses an intensive system of rewards to teach children with autism to modify certain behaviours. Currently, the province of Ontario funds ABA for children ages two to five.

Starr and her husband Arthur Fleishmann, as well as 28 other families with children with autism, are seeking $100 million in compensatory damages from the provincial government, alleging it is discriminating against these children by refusing to fund the therapy program once they reach the age of six.

The case, which began in Superior Court in Toronto in April, is on a summer break until Sept. 8.

Starr testified at the trial last month that Carly has been participating in an ABA program at home for four years, but "before ABA she was basically untamed – trapped in herself. She used to sit trancelike and withdrawn in her own world, and she wasn't yet toilet trained."

Now, she rides a bicycle, has received a swimming certificate – in September she would not get into the pool – clears her dinner plate, dresses herself, and packs her own bag for school. She also "hangs out" with her twin sister's friends "because she wants to be part of the action," Starr told the court.

"It has been like baby steps getting her to this point," she said.

Starr estimated that since 1999, when Carly began ABA, they have spent about $165,000 on the therapy alone.

"It has been very stressful funding and managing the program. We are always talking about money.

"Managing Carly's life has taken so much out of us that the other kids [they also have a 12-year-old son] have suffered. It has impacted on them. My availability is limited.

"I am always advocating for [Carly]. Everything she has in place is because I have advocated for it. We also bear the brunt of the costs," Starr testified.

Families sue province to pay costs past age 6

Their family income is significant, Starr said, but they also have to pay for their son's private school tuition and tutors – he has learning disabilities – and they are planning a bar mitzvah and would like to save money for university tuition.

"The bar mitzvah is an important thing for me because it is a happy event. We have had so many unhappy events."

Until now, she testified, the family has been able to "hold things together, but we are concerned about the future. I can see a critical point coming."

The money they have spent so far on ABA has been "100 per cent worth it," Starr told the court. "Without it, [Carly] would have had no life. Everything she does is because of the therapy. She does nothing intuitively.

"She has a quality of life now that she never would have had. Imagine Helen Keller without Annie Sullivan."

Starr said in an interview that she is quite optimistic about the outcome of the case because "the judge heard poignant, yet consistent testimony from experts.

"I'm not, however, expecting a quick fix. Who knows how long it will take, but if I don't do this, nothing will happen."

'Mrs. Magen David Adom' retires after 23 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After a walk through Montreal's Yellow Pages, Shirley Moscovitch, retired national executive director of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel, began a career that spanned 23 years.

"I saw a listing for Canadian Magen David Adom [MDA] for Israel, and I had never heard of the charity. Being of curious nature, I immediately called the number, and as luck would have it, the person who answered the phone remembered me from the Jewish National Fund where I had worked for 26 years.

"He told me that the organization was in search of a national executive director. We set up a meeting and the rest is history," says Moscovitch, 65, who was in Toronto recently for a tribute reception sponsored by the organization's Toronto chapter in honour of her retirement.

"When I heard at that meeting that Magen David Adom was Israel's humanitarian emergency medical, blood, ambulance and disaster service, I was in awe. Why was this the best-kept secret?"

Moscovitch began her job with the newly formed Canadian arm of the organization by looking through receipts. Small donations had been received in response to solicitations sent out by an American mail house on MDA's behalf.

"I realized this was not cost-efficient so I began to type 40,000 names onto a master sheet, and had them made into labels. All this was B.C. – before computers."

She was a young widow raising three daughters when she took the job, she said, and "I threw myself into my work to fill a void in my life. It became my calling. I identified myself as Mrs. Magen David Adom."

But MDA was funded through its mailing list, she said. "I would go through the telephone directory and send letters to names I thought were Jewish. I let people know that even if we did without a few luxuries here and there, we have to help Israel; that is what is important. We must protect our home."

Shirley Moscovitch

People rally around Israel when there is a crisis, and blood is being shed, she said, "but we need to be supportive all the time. We shouldn't wait for a crisis.

"I've been to Israel seven times, and working here I've had the opportunity to work hand-in-hand with Israelis. They are special people who are ready to risk their lives."

But her work in the Jewish community did not stop with her paid job. She has started a widows group, a Jewish singles association and a business and professional group at the Golden Age Centre.

After a 49-year career, Moscovitch is looking forward to taking off her watch. She plans to go to cottage country, listen to the birds, and paint, she says.

Beth Torah reaches membership capacity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As the High Holy Days approach, it's not uncommon for synagogues to advertise in the hope of recruiting new members. Beth Torah Congregation, however, will definitely not be taking that route this fall.

The low-profile, unaffiliated congregation located west of Dufferin Street and south of Lawrence Avenue, closed membership this spring because it had reached capacity. It now has a waiting list of 40 families.

Since Rabbi Yossi Sapirman became the synagogue's spiritual leader in 1998, membership has grown from 218 families to almost 360.

In addition, he noted in a phone interview, the demographics have changed to reflect a younger membership. The year Rabbi Sapirman began, there were eight b'nai mitzvah at the synagogue. Now there are about 50 a year, and most of the families are members, he said.

At a recent simchah, the 35-year-old rabbi's sense that Beth Torah's image as a congregation of senior citizens has changed was confirmed by a guest who asked him, "Rabbi, do you have any older people in your shul?"

He attributes the change to word of mouth. In fact, Marlene Cooper, who joined with her husband Sheldon just over a year ago in anticipation of their 11-year-old daughter's bat mitzvah, heard about the synagogue and its rabbi from her mother, who had attended a baby naming there.

Beth Torah, which holds traditional Conservative-style services, was a place where Marlene, who was raised Reform, and Sheldon, whose background was more traditional, both felt comfortable, she said.

Most importantly, she said, the rabbi was very welcoming. "Everybody was friendly. It's a very down-to-earth shul… [and] they try very hard to get the kids involved."

She was impressed by the fact that younger children are given their own small Torahs for the Torah procession, and that her older daughter received a thank-you note from the rabbi for being a volunteer babysitter during the High Holy Days last year.

Although Rabbi Sapirman initiated a number of kid-friendly changes, he credits the older generation, including members who founded the congregation in 1961, with having "the wisdom to understand that they had to let it happen… It has been their intention all along to let this happen."

Occasionally, the rabbi hears a complaint about increased noise levels during services, but he said that's outweighed virtually unanimously by a feeling the children "are our future."

Part of his mandate, he said, was to bring young people into the shul. The congregation now has its own Hebrew school – called Hebrew's Kool – that serves 30 students, under Rabbi Sapirman's auspices.

He feels it's his duty to know everyone at the synagogue personally. "I don't want anyone to ever feel like they're just a number."

Rabbi Sapirman has revitalized the synagogue, said president Eva Zimmerman.

Charade anew

These words were written after Mahmoud Abbas, the prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, arrived in Washington, D.C., and after he met with some congressional leaders, but before he met with U.S. President George Bush.

"Israel must take bold steps to meet its obligations under the peace plan," he told his American hosts. In particular, he complained to the congressmen about the security fence Israel is building, as well as Israel's refusal to release, wholesale, all the Palestinian prisoners being held in Israeli jails and the alleged construction of new "settlements."

Two days earlier, he told a press conference in Egypt that "cracking down on Hamas, Jihad and the Palestinian organizations was not an option at all." And thus the Palestinian leadership charade begins anew. Purporting to subscribe to the terms of an agreement that he signed – namely the U.S.-sponsored "road map" peace plan – Abbas, like PA President Yasser Arafat in his Oslo agreement days, proceeds to ignore them entirely.

Disarming extremist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad is explicitly recorded as a condition of the road map and an explicit obligation of the PA. Yet it is clear those commitments mean nothing to Abbas, just as they meant nothing to Arafat.

Last week, Ha'aretz reported that "a senior [Israel Defence Forces] officer at general headquarters said lifting the restrictions on Palestinian movement along the main north south road in the Gaza Strip had been exploited by terror groups as they prepare for a renewal of hostilities. They are training in the use of rockets, bomb making and infantry combat, the sources said." The sources also said Hamas conducted test launches of two rockets last week, apparently to test their range, which it is trying to extend to 12 to 13 kilometres, compared to the current eight.

Nothing has changed among Palestinian leaders.

And that is too bad. For until there is real change, there will be no prosperity or fulfillment for their people.

On July 10, the editorial entitled Will no cleric speak? asked the question "Why… do we not hear from Muslim clerics, locally or abroad, publicly, loudly, unambiguously condemning suicide bombings?"

One of our readers brought to our attention a Reuters news report from July 12 of a statement condemning all attacks by suicide bombers that was made by Sheikh Mohamad Syed Tantawi of Cairo's Al-Azhar university to journalists at an international conference of Islamic scholars in Putrajaya, near Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

Sheikh Tantawi said groups who practise extremism and carry out suicide bombings are enemies of Islam. According to the report, Tantawi, whose al-Azhar university is the highest authority in Sunni Islam, said suicide attacks by Muslims, including those against Israelis, are unjustified. "They were wrong," he said, adding that extremism is not the way to vent frustrations.

The CJN thanks our reader for bringing this statement to our attention. If only there were more such statements and more Muslim clerics to follow Tantawi's example.

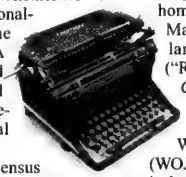
Definitions of Judaism irrelevant

I wish to respond to the article "Sociologist Questions Jewish Population Study" (CJN, July 10).

One of the points of pride of our Canadian Jewish community has always been that we accept as part of "the community" those who choose to affiliate and consider themselves Jewish according to the broadest realistic definition possible.

When a person in our community comes to join the JCC, uses services of any organization or participates in any community event, we do not ask them to define their personal beliefs or practices. When a young adult participates in a Birthright Israel program, we don't ask them about how they define their Judaism. Nor do we ask donors to UJA/CJA if we should limit service to those with a "different" definition of their Judaism.

Prof. Leo Davids may, from his perspective, raise valid issues of concern to sociological discourse. Fortunately, these considerations are not at the forefront of appropriate community planning. As our community has evolved, so have personal interpretations of Judaism. Whether we find these definitions or interpretations personally acceptable is irrelevant to the task of the Canadian Jewish demography project of UIA Federations Canada. Our task is to understand who we might potentially have to serve, as well as those who might enter our schools and home-care services and contribute to our local UJA/CJA campaigns.



In bringing together his opinion and the census count, Davids is improperly using information to make an irrelevant point. The Canadian Jewish communities developed a definition of Judaism for the census in 1981 under the leadership of Prof. James Torczyner of McGill University and Montreal's FEDERATION CJA (then Allied Jewish Community Services) in order to develop an approach that was inclusive and appropriate to the task of community development and community service. The Canadian census is a self-descriptive tool, not a Jewish identity study. Further analysis by communities may at some point address issues of identity, but a population count cannot be used for that purpose.

Community building is about "opening the tent" to all who wish to participate. Today, there are likely many Jews using community service who define themselves as Jews by ethnicity alone. If Davids chooses to "close the tent" to those who define themselves in a certain way, that is his choice. I would prefer to take the chance that they may enter at any point and broaden their personal Jewish definition by being welcomed.

Maxyne Finkelstein
Executive Vice President, UIA Federations Canada

Don't get me wrong

In the article "Sociologist Questions Jewish Population Study" (CJN, July 10), some readers might think I am denigrating UIA Federations Canada and its demographic project, or attacking the entire fundraising process. Such an erroneous impression is unfortunate, as the only issue under discussion is the scientific-philosophical problem of who shall be counted into the community on the basis of Canadian Census data. I am not out to do any UIA or federation bashing. I have always been and continue to be a contributor.

However, caution in Jew-counting is still reasonable. This discussion is not about whether the excellent work by the federations should continue to receive our wholehearted support. It certainly should.

Jewish refugees from Arab lands

In your report about the newly formed organization Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), which is lobbying for the rights of Jews displaced from their homes in those countries, Winnipeg lawyer David Matas is quoted as stating that the issue has been largely ignored by the international community ("Report calls for justice for Jews from Arab lands," CJN, July 3).

Sadly, Matas is correct.

However, it should be kept in mind that the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC) was formed in the early 1970s in Israel with precisely the same aims as JJAC.

I was a founding member of that organization.

The first speech in Toronto on this topic was given at a teach-in for Syrian Jews in January 1973.

In addition, Canadian Jewish Congress repeatedly dealt with the issue at several of its plenaries, where experts as well as representatives of the refugees gave details of what was left behind in the Arab countries, not only by individuals, but also by long-established communal institutions.

I had the privilege of moving unanimously adopted resolutions at each such plenary calling for compensation, and then presenting such resolutions to the Canadian government.

Unfortunately, they fell on deaf ears.

Notwithstanding United Nations Resolution 242, neither the State of Israel nor world Jewry pursued this issue until very recently, nor did they press Canada, who was appointed gavel-holder of the Refugee Working Group as a result of the Madrid "peace conference."

Contrary to the apparent view of Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, the claims of Jews from Arab countries impinge as directly as Palestinian claims on the mandate of the Refugee Working Group.

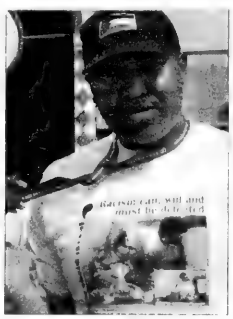
Israel is not an apartheid state

By ED MORGAN

"Dress it up any way you like, but in the end it's still apartheid," wrote Arab Israeli politician Azmi Bishara in Egypt's Al-Ahram newspaper on, of all dates, Sept. 11, 2001.

Equating Israeli society with apartheid has become an increasingly shrill rallying cry of Palestinian advocacy in recent years. The visit of former South African President F.W. deKlerk to Israel in June has again brought the comparison into the spotlight. It is a false equation, but not one that should be taken lightly.



For those who follow these debates closely, three different types of "apartheid" accusations are commonly levelled against the State of Israel: discrimination against Arab Israelis, the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza as a form of apartheid policy and the fundamental nature of Zionism as an apartheid-like ideology. Let's look at each of those in turn.

The hallmark of apartheid is not just racism but formal, institutionalized racial segregation built into the very structure of society. Thus, for example, when Assembly of First Nations National Chief Mathew Coon Come made headlines two years ago at the United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, by accusing Canada of racism in its treatment of aboriginal people, he specifically avoided use of the "A" word. No one could deny that the aboriginal communities of Ipperwash, Oka or Davis Inlet have suffered social and economic deprivations that rival the worst of the developing world. It is also the case, however, that the apartheid label as applied to Canada would have rung hollow in the ears of Durban's local audience.

The same approach was taken at the conference by the outspoken Rev. Jesse Jackson, who accused the United States of racial polarization and economic discrimination in its treatment of African Americans. Anyone who has even briefly visited Harlem, South Chicago or the rural South can verify the extent of poverty and socio-economic disadvantage of black America. Nevertheless, the United States, like Canada, espouses equal rights in the legal and political system, and so neither qualifies as an apartheid regime.

Israel's Arab minority is very much in the same boat. It would be difficult to refute Arab claims of inferior housing, schools and municipal services as compared to the residents of Israeli Jewish towns. Despite programs such as affirmative action admissions to Haifa University and contributions by the New Israel Fund and other Jewish charities to infrastructure development in the Arab sector, the competition with Jewish development towns, new immigrant absorption, defence and other government priorities has left Arab towns and villages with a disproportionately small share of national resources.

At the same time, Israeli law has for the most part equalized the rights of the Arab population. While Arabs do not get drafted for service in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), they enjoy full political rights as citizens, including voting in elections and standing for national and local office. There are Arab mayors, judges, professors and members of all the professions. The vestiges of discrimination in employment, schooling and housing have been formally overturned. Azmi Bishara, who led a march at Durban denouncing Israel as an apartheid state, is himself living proof that the apartheid label is inappropriate. Whatever else he may complain of, this third-term Knesset member cannot say that he and his community are treated the way the apartheid regime of South Africa treated its Zulu, Tswana and Xhosa citizens.

The West Bank and Gaza raise a different set of issues. The Arab residents of these territories are not Israeli citizens. Indeed, the Geneva Convention, which sets out the rights and duties of an occupying power following a military conflict, prohibits the imposition of a new citizenship onto, and the implied annexation of, the territories and their residents. Nevertheless, the separation of the two communities and the fact that Palestinians in the territories live under military administration rather than Israeli civilian law hints of "separate development" (the literal translation of the Afrikaans word apartheid) along ethnic lines of a type that the world has come to see as forbidden. In order to counter this misimpression, some historical reminders are in order.

At least since the UN's 1947 Partition Resolution, the territorial division of what was Mandatory Palestine into two separate states, has been the international community's approach to the political aspirations of Jews and Palestinians. In the words of Britain's 1937 Peel Commission Report, "[a]n irrepressible conflict has arisen between two national communities within the narrow bounds of one small country." This separation of national identities and governance was further entrenched in the 1993 Oslo process and remains a part of the ongoing relationship between the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli government today. While the military confrontation has led to attacks against Israel and occupation by Israel of lands on which Palestinians reside, the treatment of the two national communities as separate from one another is not an apartheid-like offence against international norms. Rather it is a fulfillment of those norms.

The deepest accusation levelled against Israel, of course, is one that attacks the very ideology on which the state is founded. The 1977 UN General Assembly resolution declaring Zionism to be a form of racism, although repealed a decade after its enactment, still resounds in many anti-Israel circles. In this view, the May 14, 1948 proclamation by founding father David Ben-Gurion and his colleagues "representing the Jewish people in Palestine and the World Zionist Movement" establishing "the Jewish State in Palestine, to be called the State of Israel" created nothing more than an ethnically or religiously exclusive, and therefore illegitimate, enclave. At bottom, this version of the apartheid analogy negates the very possibility of Jewish sovereignty, as reflected in Article 18 of the May 28, 1964 Palestine National Covenant: "The claims of historic and spiritual ties between Jews and Palestine are not in agreement with the facts of history or with the true basis of sound statehood. Judaism, because it is a divine religion, is not a nationality with independent existence."

The ultimate question posed by the apartheid analogy, then, is whether Israel can be both Jewish and democratic in any true sense of those words. After all, while the state has committed itself in its Proclamation of Independence to "the full social and political equality of all its citizens", including "freedom of religion, conscience, education and culture," it is at the same time fundamentally committed to "the right of the Jewish people to national revival in their own country." The accusation has been that the combination of ethno-religious identity with a modern, liberal state system is simply impossible. This skepticism about an inclusive rather than exclusive Jewish nation was voiced as early as 1922, when then-British colonial secretary Winston Churchill said Palestine could never be "as Jewish as England is English."

In recent years, the important challenge of reconciling the Jewish with the democratic character of the state has been taken up by Israel's Supreme Court. In the view of Chief Justice Aharon Barak, religious identity is central to the state, but it does not take the form of ethnic superiority of Jewish over non-Jewish citizens, nor does it entail the theocratic establishment of rabbinical institutions. Instead, Jewish character resides in the value system that permeates the political and legal system. Nowhere does this theme arise more graphically than in the cases challenging the acts of Israel's security forces. Under Barak's stewardship, the legal values of democracy have been adapted to protect the Jewish state against its enemies while Jewish values have been invoked to protect even those enemies against arbitrary acts of the state.

Last year, for example, the Supreme Court ordered the IDF to temporarily lift its siege of Bethlehem's Church of the Nativity in order to allow food to be passed to the terrorists and their hostages holed up inside. In doing so, the court stated, "The armed conflict against terrorism is an armed conflict of the law against those who seek to destroy it... But in addition, the State of Israel is a state whose values are Jewish and democratic. Here we have established a state that preserves law, that achieves its national goals and the vision of generations, and that does so while recognizing and realizing human rights in general and human dignity in particular. Between these two there are harmony and accord, not conflict and estrangement."

Likewise, the court has indicated that it is part of the Jewish and democratic system that all of Israel's citizens, from the Arab villager to the IDF's chief of staff, must be equally subject to the law. Using an analogy that Churchill himself may have appreciated, Barak made reference to a 17th-century debate between King James I and Lord Justice Coke in finding the Shin Bet's methodology subject to judicial review: "The king is not subject to man, but subject to God and the law."

The statement is repeated in Canada's Charter of Rights, whose preamble states that the country believes in "the supremacy of God and the rule of law." Not everyone in Israel is Jewish just as not everyone in England is English or even Anglican and not all Canadians are Anglo-Protestant or French Catholic. But Israel is governed by a value system that combines its religious heritage with democracy in much the same way as England or Canada does. The result has been inclusion for the Arab population of the state.

As a member of a minority group, Azmi Bishara may find reasons to complain about his government's various policies or the economic conditions in which he lives. He can dress it up any way he likes, but in the end, it's just not apartheid.

Optimism reconsidered

I was raised to be an optimist. My mother, a supreme optimist, taught me the future always brings good tidings. In yeshiva, I learned how prayer and mitzvot shield the righteous from harm. Don't worry, bad things don't happen to good people, I recall being told. As a student, I learned how the march of scientific progress has cured disease and improved life. How could I be anything but an optimist?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Indeed, optimism is what led me to the rabbinate. The pulpit seemed a perfect place to share my idealistic dreams of progress and redemption.

Ironically, the rabbinate actually did much to erode my optimism. Until I started working as a rabbi, tragedy was pretty much an abstraction, something remote. It is as a rabbi that I first had to confront actual tragedies.

Unfortunately, I have officiated at funerals for accident victims and visited parents sitting shivah for their children. While I was struggling with these tragedies in my own community, in New York and Israel, terrorists murdered thousands of innocents in suicide attacks. The convergence of these catastrophic events shook my optimism, and even my faith. I learned life doesn't always have a happy ending. I realized that bad things can happen to good people.

I was forced to reconsider my beliefs. In my search for new insights, authors such as Rav Joseph Soloveitchik, Victor Frankl and Rabbi Kalonimus Kalman Shapira – the Piaseczner Rebbe – opened my eyes to realistic approaches to the problem of evil. My belief became more profound, and there was even some room for optimism.

I no longer believe things will always go well. (I haven't shelved my hopes completely, but that's for another day). I can never again be a passive optimist. Passive optimists believe "all is for the best" and whatever happens, no matter how awful, is truly good. Actually, this approach is insensitive, disparaging the genuine suffering that many people experience.

But even a realist can be an optimist. I cannot be sure everything will be alright. I do not know or understand God's plans. But if I try, I can improve things. This is the optimism of action, an optimism about what we can accomplish.

The world is tragic, but we can still produce happiness. Terrorists, illnesses and accidents destroy the beautiful and the innocent. It's up to us to combat evil, give love and create new life. With kindness, spirituality and progress, we can improve the world.

My current optimism has nothing to do with fate. I believe in free will and the possibility of human goodness. I am optimistic because I can, and you can, choose to improve the world. All we have to do is make the right choices.

When Israelis focus almost exclusively on social and economic affairs, it's a sure sign that they feel less vulnerable on security matters. And the relative quiet of the last three weeks has brought the burning debate over Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's draconian cuts to the national budget to the surface.

The facts are clear to all Israelis: the country's economy is in crisis. Over the last three years, the combination of a world economic slump, a decline of tourism and foreign investment, 10 per cent unemployment and huge defence expenditures have created unprecedented pressures.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

But at the heart of it all is a long overdue discussion about the nature of the Israeli welfare state and government transfer payments that comprise 40 per cent of the budget. Former Labor and Likud governments have all realized that Israel can no longer afford a social safety net that encourages welfare payments as a steady form of income. This year's budget has slashed these payments for most disadvantaged sectors. And while the public generally accepts this, the latest popular dissent movement poses an unexpected, populist challenge to Netanyahu's plans.

It's a finance minister's nightmare: scores of single mothers from around the country walking to Jerusalem and camping out for more than 40 days in a tent opposite government headquarters. Their leader, Vicky Knafo, is telegenic, aggressive and tenacious. The women want their social security payments restored, and Netanyahu wants them to go to work.

Here's the rub: over the last 20 years, income support has grown to the point where it discourages work, while the number of recipients has grown exponentially. If the government caves in to the single mothers' demands now, the women will have no incentive to seek employment.

In a way, the emotional debate over the mothers and their kids diverts attention from the heart of the matter, which has little to do with the numbers per se. Israel's transition from socialism to a free market system has been done in an ad hoc manner that has left some sacred cows untouched, thereby creating serious inequities and public criticism. And as serious as Netanyahu is in wanting to introduce a shift in Israel's economic psychology, many inconsistencies remain. For example, monopolies in public services perpetuate padded salaries and benefits; generous tax breaks are available to all residents of settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, regardless of income; and the issue of welfare payments linked to exemptions from military service for yeshiva students remains largely unresolved. Moreover, cheap Palestinian labour that disappeared during the intifadah has been replaced not by Israelis but by Asian and east European foreign workers. Today, there are 300,000 unemployed Israelis and 300,000 foreign workers. The equation is clear.

Netanyahu took on the finance portfolio reluctantly. He knows finance ministers are doomed to fail politically, and he wants to be the Likud candidate in the next national election. He hopes to resolve the apparent contradiction by turning around the economic ship using a two-pronged strategy: tax and budget cuts in 2003, followed by growth in 2004. If successful, his plan will benefit the economy, the people and the minister himself. If he fails, the economy will collapse along with his political future. It's a huge gamble, and the current unrest makes it tougher.

Recent polls show the public is ambivalent. Israelis understand things must change drastically, but they lack confidence in the proposed measures. They back reform, but they believe tax and welfare cuts will simply benefit the rich and enlarge the poverty pool.

The public is right in sensing an inherent weakness in the economic plan. Given the scale of private sector layoffs in the last year and looming public sector shrinkage, Netanyahu has done little to create confidence in job creation. Finance ministry officials are opposed to any initiative that will be perceived as tinkering with a slashed budget. In Israel, the Thatcherite model of economic reform will fail politically unless accompanied by some short-term solutions.

As this column goes to print, the politicians have gotten the message. Over the next weeks, cabinet ministers will likely tinker with the plan in an effort to make it more palatable. And if they are fortunate, the single mothers' campaign will run out of steam and allow for a more principled, comprehensive debate on the core issues involved.

Bumping into history

"I was an honest writer who was walking down the street one day when he bumped into history," the Oscar-winning screenwriter Ben Hecht would recall about his Jewish awakening in the 1930s. Until then, Hecht had indulged himself, worshipping art and entertainment. But the Nazi threat to Jews and democracy transformed him. Unlike his peers, he did not wallow. Angered, he became an activist.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Although today's situation is less dire than the 1930s, some of us have also responded rationally with anger and activism. There have been many wake-up calls – from the Palestinians' turn away from negotiation and toward violence in September 2000 to the Islamicists' mass-murders of Sept. 11, 2001; from Hezbollah's kidnapping of three Israeli soldiers near Lebanon to the kidnapping – and beheading – of journalist Daniel Pearl; from the UN's orgy of anti-Semitism masquerading as anti-racism in Durban, South Africa, to the anti-Semitism exposed behind "mere" anti-Zionism when rioters who squelched Israeli finance minister Benjamin Netanyahu's right to speak at Concordia University threw pennies at Jews; from the world's unfair denunciation of Israel when it responded aggressively to Palestinian terrorism to the world's unfair denunciation of America when it responded aggressively to Islamic terrorism.

Those of us who have responded have often found our positions caricatured and condemned. In the last three years – and especially since I publicly proclaimed that I am a Zionist – I have been called a racist, a Nazi, a propagandist, a hypocrite, a fanatic, a false prophet, right of centre, and out of the mainstream. I get bombarded with illiterate e-mails from fake addresses, such as nauseatedwithzionistlies @aol.com, fedupwithzionists@yahoo.com and damtheusrulers@hotmail.com. Even more depressing are the well-written rants that degenerate into crude anti-Semitism and anti-Americanism and are signed by people who lack the shame to hide their names.

These attacks are badges of honour – proof my feeble attempts to defend the right ideals are annoying the "right" people. The perverse charges of Nazism and racism, damning Jews and Americans with their enemies' sins by inverting reality, do not merit consideration (although I wonder why when Jews condemn suicide bombings, we are "racists," but when Saudi Arabians finally do, they're heroes).

I plead "guilty" to many charges:

If appreciating American democracy, though imperfect, makes me a "propagandist," I plead guilty to viewing worthy ideals in proper perspective.

If contrasting Israeli culture's yearning for peace with Palestinian political culture's deification of death – which lionizes PA President Yasser Arafat and other mass-murderers – and if distinguishing innocent victims from suicide bombers makes me a "hypocrite," I plead guilty to rooting my judgments in reality, proportionality, and morality.

If having zero-tolerance for anti-Semitism and refusing to judge Israel by unrealistic standards makes me a "fanatic," so be it. Moderation and democracy need more passionate advocates.

If testifying to terrorism's evils, wherever practised and regardless of rationale, makes me a "false prophet," I hope I am also a soothsayer, foreseeing the eradication of this evil and a return to sanity, with no thanks to a complacent world.

If championing fundamental liberal ideals of free speech, religious tolerance, democracy, rule of law, fair play, and the right of civil disagreement, let alone the right of Israelis to enter pizzerias in peace, makes me "right of centre," then show me how to join the "vast right-wing conspiracy."

And if disagreeing with the conventional wisdom among reporters, academics, and Canadian and European elites boots me "out of the mainstream," there is nowhere else I would rather be.

Atlanta's mayor in the 1960s, Ivan Allen Jr., said, "If there wasn't a race issue, I could play golf every afternoon." If there weren't so many unreasonable attacks on Israel, the United States, and western civilization, I could stay hidden in my archives. But in mobilizing, we must not simply fight our enemies. We must celebrate the joys of Judaism, the blessings of Zionism, the magic of Israel and the importance of the West's democratic and liberal ideals, even while acknowledging shortcomings, criticizing imperfections and pushing harder to fulfil our ideals.

And we need more people, more galvanized moderates, more infuriated liberals, to stop playing golf, to bump into history, to risk criticism and to fight in today's multi-front war against terrorism and for democracy.

The Kirshner File

Failed peace talks topic of Shattered Dreams

During the pivotal months of 2000, Israel's guarded hopes of resolving its seemingly intractable differences with Syria and the Palestinians evaporated.

On March 26, Bill Clinton, the president of the United States, met with Hafez Assad, his Syrian counterpart, in Geneva, Switzerland, to discuss a set of Israeli proposals for settling the dispute over the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in the Six Day War. Clinton informed Assad that Israel was prepared to meet a major Syrian demand – a virtual withdrawal of Israeli forces back to the pre-1967 borders. Israel's prime minister, Ehud Barak, qualified his offer on one condition: Israel would retain the northeast corner of the Sea of Galilee, thereby denying Syria access to Israel's only freshwater lake. Assad was indignant. "The Israelis don't want peace!" he exclaimed. "There's no point in continuing."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And so the on-again, off-again Syrian track in the peace process fell by the wayside.

On July 25, despite Clinton's best efforts, the Camp David summit in Maryland concluded without an agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. On Sept. 29, a day after Likud leader Ariel Sharon went to the Temple Mount in what was widely seen as a provocative, politically inspired visit, the second Palestinian uprising in 13 years erupted. Within months, the Oslo peace process was in tatters, and Israel seemed back to square one in its relations with the Palestinians.

Charles Enderlin, the Middle East bureau chief of France's public television network, covered these overlapping events and interviewed many of the negotiators. Now, in Shattered Dreams (Other Press), Enderlin provides a fresh, vigorous appraisal of the breakdown of Israel's talks with Syria and the PA. The emphasis, however, is on the Palestinians.

In his estimation, the ultimate failure of the Syrian and Palestinian tracks was a function of intransigence, mistakes and misjudgments on all sides. For the record, Yasser Arafat, the PA president, condemned violence – a breach of the Oslo accords – as inimical to the Palestinian cause. But in practice, he was not averse to it. Meanwhile, the number of Israelis settling in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip rose exponentially from 105,940 in 1992 to 151,324 in 1995, jeopardizing the Palestinians' assumption of claiming virtually all these areas.

After Yitzhak Rabin's assassination and Shimon Peres' razor-thin defeat in the 1996 general election at the hands of his Likud rival, Benjamin Netanyahu, the tone of Israel's discourse with the Palestinians darkened. Netanyahu, an opponent of Oslo, rejected the idea of Palestinian statehood, Oslo's underlying premise, and told the Palestinians that they would have to be content with circumscribed autonomy.

Shortly after Netanyahu's accession to office, the so-called tunnel riots in eastern Jerusalem broke out, leading to the deaths of 15 Israeli soldiers and some 80 Palestinian civilians and policemen. As a result of this incident, the Israeli army drew up a plan – Operation Field of Thorns – to regain control of the West Bank and Gaza.

The mutual mistrust engendered by these riots was somewhat mitigated by Israel's redeployment in 1997 from 80 per cent of Hebron. But as far as Netanyahu was concerned, the Hebron withdrawal was contingent on his understanding that Israel would keep the rest of the West Bank. By this point, the PA controlled or partially controlled 42 per cent of the West Bank.

Netanyahu's subsequent announcement that Israel would build thousands of new housing units in Har Homa, in eastern Jerusalem, prompted the Palestinians to temporarily freeze talks with Israel. Jibril Rajoub, a leading Palestinian security official, described Har Homa as "the clinical death of the Oslo process." A Hamas suicide bombing in Jerusalem in July led Israel to suspend all contacts with the PA.

Barak, Netanyahu's successor, upset Arafat by his insistence to go straight to a final status accord. Arafat held out for the implementation of the 1998 Wye agreement, which obligated Israel to vacate another 13 per cent of the West Bank. Barak eventually complied with Wye. But he angered Arafat yet again by claiming that United Nations Resolution 242 did not apply to the West Bank, by lending more weight to talks with Syria and by issuing 3,196 new tender bids for construction in the settlements.

By this juncture, Enderlin writes, the Israeli army was gearing up for a new intifadah. Ahmed Qureia (Abu Ala), a Palestinian negotiator, had already warned Uri Savir, a senior Israeli official, that a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon would encourage Palestinian militants to resort to violence. It was an astonishingly prescient prediction.

In May 2000, around the time of Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon, Shlomo Ben Ami, a top-ranking Israeli negotiator at a new round of talks in Stockholm, offered the Palestinians 78 per cent of the West Bank and a further 10 per cent later on if they agreed to permanent status negotiations at Camp David. Although Arafat warned that a summit of such magnitude required much more preparation, he reluctantly agreed to attend.

The Palestinians declared that the basis of discussions should be the 1967 border, a principle Israel refused to accept. Indeed, Israel sought the annexation of 10.5 per cent of the West Bank and the lease of a further 10 per cent of the Jordan Valley for 20 years. Talks were also clouded by the Temple Mount imbroglio – Arafat claimed that the Jewish Temple ruins were actually Greek or Roman – and by the "right of return" issue. At one point, Palestinian negotiator Nabil Shaath said that "only 10 to 20 per cent of the Arab refugees desired to have their right to return acknowledged." Elyakim Rubinstein, an Israeli negotiator, retorted: "Ten to 20 per cent of the refugees amounts to between 400,000 and 800,000 people!"

Benjamin Netanyahu

The mounting tension took its toll. Barak, whose government was in a state of disarray when he left for Camp David, accused the Palestinians of negotiating in bad faith. In turn, Arafat charged that American official Dennis Ross, a Jew, was working "in league with the Israelis." And in a remarkable confrontation, Clinton compared Barak's flexibility with Arafat's obduracy. As he archly put it:"Barak has made so many concessions. And you've made none!"

With the outbreak of the intifadah, Barak initially refused to consider a resumption of talks with Arafat. "We don't want to reward Palestinian violence," Barak explained. According to Enderlin, the revolt was spontaneous, although Arafat was not displeased by it. By his reckoning, the intifadah gave him a strategic advantage at a moment when he was weak.

On Dec. 23, 2000, Clinton presented a bridging proposal, which may yet form the basis of a final agreement. The main points: The Palestinians would get between 94 to 96 per cent of the West Bank. In compensation for land annexed by Israel, the Palestinians would receive one to three per cent of Israeli territory. Eighty per cent of Jewish settlers would be resettled in blocks in the West Bank. In Jerusalem, Arab areas and Israeli areas would respectively be under Arab and Israeli administration, and sovereignty over the Temple Mount would essentially be shared. As for the refugees, the Palestinian state would basically be the focal point of their return.

Israel accepted these points as the basis for more negotiations, but the PA expressed reservations. Nevertheless, both sides debated these unresolved issues at Taba. Barak's call for an election froze the Taba track. Barak's successor, Sharon, completely rejected Taba.

Ross believes that Oslo's failure can be ascribed to several factors.

The PA never gave up its dependence on incitement and violence. Israel did not stop the construction of settlements, nor did it end its policy of confiscating land and destroying Palestinian houses. And, he adds, "from the very beginning, we should have held both sides accountable for the commitments they made." (This element of mandatory compliance has been incorporated into the current beleaguered road map peace plan.)

Enderlin's exposition on Israel's negotiations with Syria is far more brief but just as illuminating. Clinton claims that Rabin promised to undertake talks with Assad on the basis of a full Israeli pullback to the June 4, 1967 lines, on condition that Syria agreed to satisfactory security arrangements and a full peace, including an exchange of ambassadors and open borders. Rabin's guiding principle was that "the depth of the withdrawal will reflect the depth of peace." After Rabin's murder, Peres accepted this "deposit." Netanyahu, through intermediary Ronald Lauder, embraced the concept of an Israeli withdrawal up to the ridge overlooking the Sea of Galilee, but demanded early warning stations on Mt. Hermon.

Barak, in his talks with the Syrians in 1999 and 2000, was slightly more flexible. But to Assad, Barak's offer was also insufficient. Enderlin explores these issues at some length.

British couple celebrate 65 years together – and become Canadians after over half a century as landed immigrants

Morris & Esther Epstein

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

To most people, the dentist's office seems an unlikely place for romance. But it was at his brother's clinic more than six decades ago that Morris Epstein first laid eyes on Esther, the woman who would later become his wife.

"I saw this girl sitting there – a beautiful young lady – and that was it," said Morris, who turned 95 this month.

Morris asked Esther out on a date, despite being engaged to another woman at the time.

"She said, 'I don't make dates with engaged men,' and I said, 'Well, I'm no longer engaged,'" recounted Morris.

"I loved him. He was very handsome in his bowler hat and spats," said 88-year old Esther.

On June 9, 1938, the couple were married in London, England.

In addition to celebrating their 65th wedding anniversary this summer, the Epsteins are also becoming Canadian citizens after living as landed immigrants for 55 years.

"We will be very proud, I can assure you, to be Canadian citizens. This country's been very good to us. We feel we're living in the best country in the world," said Esther.

Soon after they were married, Esther gave birth to the couple's two children, daughter Jean and son Philip, while Morris ran a lucrative fur retail business and factory in London.

But everything changed for the young couple during the German firebombing of England during World War II.

"I lost my home and two flourishing businesses and was flat broke. I was penniless. The enemy just destroyed me completely," said Morris.

"We had two floors, 17 on staff and the next day it was just a hole in the ground," Esther added.

Starting from scratch meant either selling furs on the black market or moving the business out of England. Morris chose the latter.

"Unless you sold black market and took the risk of going to jail, you could not do any business whatsoever. I had a wife and two children to support and I wanted to do it legitimately," said Morris.

Esther said it was not easy to leave behind their tight-knit families for Canada, where they knew no one. She was one of 10 children and Morris was the youngest of seven.

Morris assured his wife that she could visit England any time she desired, no matter what their financial situation. He kept true to his word: Esther made the long trip across the ocean 18 times by ship.

In Canada, Morris started up a new fur business and Esther founded the first Jewish nursing home in Toronto, the Benslow Nursing Home.

"We worked hard and played hard," said Esther.

Celebrating Jewish customs together is one thing that has held the family together through the years. Every Shabbat and holiday, Esther prepares dinner for a dining room full of family members.

"The tradition was there, no matter how busy I was," she said.

Although he was not formally educated, Morris developed a strong understanding of Torah, which he passed down to his children and grandchildren.

Esther said she takes great joy in being a grandmother and great-grandmother. She has six grandchildren and three great-grandchildren, with a fourth on the way. She said she loved taking her grandchildren to the theatre, for walks, and giving them sweets after Shabbat dinner.

She said her grandchildren have grown up to pursue rewarding careers and many have started families of their own.

"I'm very proud of [my grandchildren]. Each and every one of them are achievers. I think this is what keeps us going – keeps us healthy anyway," Esther said.

Now that they no longer work, the couple enjoy travelling together (Esther worked until she was 75 and Morris worked until he was 80). They have been to Israel 17 times, and have travelled across Europe, through the Canadian Rockies, and have gone on a number of cruises, including a recent one to Alaska.

Morris and Esther both agree that their support for each other through good times and bad is what has kept their marriage going.

"There wasn't one pulling one way and one pulling the other way," Esther said. "If you can't pull together when times get a little rough, you may as well call it quits."

"Now I can look in the mirror and smile!"

Torontonian named head of NCSY

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Torontonian Zale Newman has been appointed national director of National Conference of Synagogue Youth, (NCSY), the youth arm of the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations (OU).

The announcement was made last month at OU national headquarters in New York by OU president Harvey Blitz, executive vice-president Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb and NCSY youth commission chair Moishe Bane.

Although Newman will officially move to New York in January, he has already started travelling across the United States and Canada to meet with NCSY staff and lay leadership.

Newman, 47, is probably best known as the creator of Uncle Moishy and the Mitzvah Men, who teach Jewish themes using snappy, singable songs in their concerts and 15 albums. He also produced albums for the late Jewish soul singer Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

Newman is also well-known in Toronto circles for his work in business and outreach to Jewish youth.

He was educated at Yeshiva, McGill and York universities and holds an MBA in marketing and corporate strategy from York. He also attended yeshiva in Jerusalem for two years and studies Torah every day.

Zale Newman
The New York Jewish Week

Newman's business background includes executive positions at General Mills Canada and a variety of financial services companies. He is currently a partner with Panfinancial, a Toronto financial services firm.

Newman's involvement with NCSY, almost entirely in a volunteer capacity, dates back to 1968. He has been an advisor in various NCSY regions and has served as regional director in Montreal. He has also been co-chair of the Canada Regional Youth Commission and a teacher, speaker and master of ceremonies at many NCSY events.

Newman says he plans to use techniques from the business and market research worlds to learn what today's teens want and need, and then to develop appropriate responses. For instance, he will introduce programs on a trial basis in one region, and then, if they are successful, expand them nationally, making adjustments as necessary.

Newman's three-year plan is to greatly expand the range of NCSY's influence. While he will still address the needs of already observant Jewish youth, he also plans outreach to "those who know little abut their rich Jewish heritage and are in danger of being lost to the Jewish people," he said in a statement.

Informal educational techniques, such as shabbatons, camps, and Israel programs, are the most effective, he believes, but says this expansion and greater presence can only come about through increased fundraising.

Besides winding up his business interests, Newman is working on a siddur, High Holy Days machzor and Passover haggadah for beginners, featuring simplified text, explanations and graphics.

His ultimate goal, he said in the statement, is "to touch our young people emotionally and make them feel good about themselves and about Judaism. NCSY will always be positive and creative. It will always be upbeat. That's the way we will succeed."

The CJN will feature an interview with Newman in an upcoming issue.

Two opposites, two extremes

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Tisha b'Av, the ninth day of the month of Av, is approaching and we remember the destructions of the temples and the resulting exile. It is a day of mourning that seems to stand alone in its darkness. It seems that this day speaks to us of history and destruction and ultimate loss. Yet the lesson lies beyond the historic event to which Tisha b'Av connects. We must remember more than history. We must remember how quickly history can change.

The rabbinic text, Lamentations Rabbah, points out that Tisha b'Av will always fall on the same day of the week as the first night of Passover. The connection between Passover and Tisha b'Av is an important one. It is the juxtaposition of two extremes.

The midrash tells us that for everything God created in the world, the opposite was also created. "But for the one, the other would not be. But for death, there would be no life and but for life there would be no death." When we look at the world, we realize that only God stands unique with no pair, with no opposite.

On Passover we celebrate our beginnings as a Jewish nation. We embark on a journey toward God and national revelation. We stand on the banks of the Red Sea and we sing a song of glory composed by the prophet Moses, who told us of wonderful things that would happen.

On Tisha b'Av, we mourn the end of an era. The relationship with God as expressed through the Temple is gone. We gather together and sing a dirge, Lamentations, composed by the prophet Jeremiah, who had told us disaster loomed.

On Passover, we revel in the story of how God fought for us and redeemed us from slavery and wicked oppression. We rejoice in our freedom. On Tisha b'Av, we mourn the reality of our victimization at the hands of evil empires. We are enslaved once again and many midrashim speak of how God, grudgingly, strengthened the hands of our enemies.

On Passover, we include our children in the ritual. We encourage them to prod us with questions so that we may educate them. We play hide and seek with the afikoman and we laugh as they race through the finishing songs. On Tisha b'Av, we remember that our children were ripped from our arms and sold. We can no longer show them the beauty of the Temple, and we cannot hold their hands as we make national pilgrimages to Jerusalem. We play no games and the song we teach them is a slow, haunting, mournful dirge.

But the lesson is not in the opposites of the two events, rather in their commonality. They will always fall on the same day of the week. This year we sang of our freedom on a Wednesday night and we will chant the tale of Jerusalem's destruction on a Wednesday night. We cannot ignore that we are meant to see the contrasts.

As we fast on Tisha b'Av, on Wednesday night, we must remember that there was a Wednesday night not long ago when we feasted. On that night, we sat together and leaned over. On Tisha b'Av, we ask how Jerusalem sat so alone and so desolate.

The world has been created in pairs, in oppositions. We cannot truly understand anything created in the world as a singularity. We cannot understand Tisha b'Av without Passover, nor can we appreciate Passover without Tisha b'Av. Two extremes, two opposites – one night

Online bidding for Judaica

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Want to bid on an original Chagall? How about a siddur from the 16th century? Or a baseball card featuring a major league Jewish ball player? Although you may be tempted to travel to a famous auction house to do your bidding, you can bid for a wealth of Jewish artifacts and ephemera right from your computer. While some auction sites specialize in low-cost items, others will deal in antique Judaica and rare paintings that will set you back tens of thousands of dollars – and more.

Please note that inclusion of a site in this column should not be considered a recommendation. Before you buy (or sell) anything through an online auction, you should check the reliability of the site and its policies regarding commission, shipping, insurance, tax, duty and returns. In fact, before you visit any site, I strongly recommend reading a primer created by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission, "Internet Auctions: A Guide for Buyers and Sellers." [http://www.ftc.gov/bcp/ conline/pubs/online/auctions.htm] Prices quoted in this column refer to reserve or current bids for items on sale when this column was written. Unless noted, prices are in U.S. dollars.

Of course the granddaddy of all online auctions isn't actually a "Jewish" auction. But Jewish collectors are bound to find something interesting at ebay.com. You can jump directly to eBay's Jewish section, where there were over 2,000 items for sale when I last checked. [http://makeashorter link.com /?L2FA21555] There are far fewer Jewish and Israeli items for sale at eBay's Canadian site, but it's also worth a look. How about bidding on three commemorative Israeli postage stamps from 1979, autographed by former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek and the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin ($74.95)? [http://makeashorter link.com/?F2DA1555]

Despite its name, Art Online doesn't actually conduct its auctions online. But it does let you browse the items to be sold at the next public auction to take place in Ramat Gan and place your bid online. If you had your eye on Marc Chagall's Bouquet de fleurs et fruits - 1980, I'm sorry to tell you you're too late. It was sold recently for $149,500. [http://www.artonline.co.il/] If you really want to bid online for high quality "investment grade art" (and have nerves of steel), go to Hammersite, where you will find works by a who's who of Israeli and international artists. [http://www.hammersite.com]

Virtual Judaica Auctions specializes in antiquarian Jewish books and rare documents. There is a first edition of Kol Bochim – Lamentations, Venice, 1589 ($901), a letter by Rabbi Abraham ben Rabbi Jacob Avihazira, Morocco, 1883 ($2,700) and Sir Moses Montefiore's copy of The Order of the Daily Prayers, London, 1810 ($170). Even if you don't intend to bid, this site is worth a visit to see the high quality scans of these rare items. [http://virt ualjudaica.com/]

Aside from having a catchy name, OyVey Auctions markets itself as a low-cost site with a social conscience. Eighteen per cent of its annual profits plus the proceeds from one 24-hour day in each month are donated to such charities as the Simon Wiesenthal Center and Aish HaTorah. Items include a Holocaust armband ($49.95), a men's 14K gold chai with chain ($19.95), and a Shawn Green Upper Deck baseball card ($9.99). [http://www.oyveyauc tions.com]

Although it couldn't possibly match the thrill of bargaining in an Israeli shuk, a site eshuk.com describes itself "the best play to buy and sell anything and everything Jewish." On the block when I looked were a mahogany and silver challah board ($60), a copy of the Heimishe Kitchen kosher cookbook ($13.50) and a mezuzah parchment ($64.99). [http://www.eshuk.com/]

If you're planning a trip to Israel and want to go upscale from falafel and hummus, try bidding on a meal at a restaurant. Here's how it works: a recent dinner for two at Petach Tikvah's Thai Pan Restaurant was valued at 200 Israeli shekalim. After an online auction, the high bid for the meal was 120 shekalim. So the bid winner will enjoy a 200-shekel meal at almost half price. Other featured restaurants for biddable meals include Jaffa's Le Relais (French) and Ramat Gan's El Gaucho (Argentine). [http://www.eluna.com/ Auction]

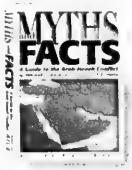
On terrorism and pre-emption

MYTH:

Israeli complaints about Palestinian terrorists hiding among civilians are just an effort to justify the killing of innocent people.

FACT:



Israel never intentionally targets civilians. Unfortunately, Palestinian terrorists have purposely tried to hide among the civilian population in an effort to use the Israeli army's code of ethics against it. The terrorists themselves do not care about the lives of innocent Palestinians, and their use of them as human shields is in violation of international law. Article 51 of the 1977 amendment to the 1949 Geneva Convention specifically prohibts the use of human shields:

"The presence or movements of the civilian population or individual civilians shall not be used to render certain points or areas immune from military operations, in particular in attempts to shield military objectives from attacks or to shield, favour or impede military operations."

Thus, Palestinian terrorists are ultimately responsible for these non-combatants who are inadvertently killed or wounded.

MYTH:

Israel's assassination attempt on a leader of Hamas was aimed at derailing the peace process laid out in the road map peace plan.

FACT:

In just the first week after accepting the road map peace plan, Israel began to implement 75 per cent of its obligations called for in the plan's first phase. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon made clear he was committed to the agreement by allowing Palestinian workers from the territories to enter Israel, withdrawing from cities in the Palestinian Authority (PA) where Palestinian security forces exert control, dismantling unauthorized outposts, releasing prisoners, lifting the general closure on the territories and increasing the transfer of goods.

The most important obligation for the Palestinians in the first phase is to end violence, dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, and disarm the militants. PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas not only has made no effort to fulfill this prerequisite for peace, he explicitly said he would not take action against Hamas, which has rejected the road map and said it would join with other Palestinian terrorist groups to continue their campaign to destroy Israel.

Hamas' covenant makes clear it will never accept the existence of a Jewish state in what it considers the Muslim heartland. The man Israel recently tried to kill, Abd al-Aziz Rantissi, is a senior Hamas leader who proudly claims "credit" for 72 suicide bombings that have killed 227 Israelis and wounded 1,393 since September 2000.

Rather than ask why Israel attempted to kill an avowed terrorist, the pertinent question is: Why wasn't Rantissi in jail? PA President Yasser Arafat pledged in the Oslo agreements to fight terror and yet he failed to take any steps against Hamas. Abbas promised a renewed commitment to stop violence, but he has done no more than Arafat, and has unsuccessfully tried to co-opt Hamas rather than dismantle it.

Medical program brings Israeli, Arab students together

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Adib Naser Eddin, 23, grew up in east Jerusalem, where he now attends medical school at Al-Quds University.

Nir Brosh, 29, went to high school in Haifa and began his medical education at Ben Gurion University in Be'er Sheva after his compulsory army duty and a year travelling in South America.

Even though their schools are only about 100 kilometers apart, it's unlikely their two paths ever crossed.

But over the month of June, the two students – one Arab and one Israeli – were part of a Middle East foursome who ignored the perceived dangers of Toronto's second SARS outbreak and came here to study, work and tour together.

The new Canadian-based program was established jointly by the Student University Network for Social and International Health (SUNSIH) and the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO).

Canada provides a safe environment where political issues don't have to be confronted on a daily basis, said Shannon Wires, who co-ordinated the project with Alex Martiniuk (both are past presidents of SUNSIH).

Within the structure of the Canadian program, the students collaborated on health related projects – specifically pediatric oncology – and presented papers about childhood cancer from physical and psychosocial perspectives.

During the last week, the students were partnered with families at Camp Trillium, a camp for children with cancer and their families. The experience allowed the students to understand what families dealing with cancer must cope with, Wires said.

At the same time, the intensity of the program facilitated the building of personal relationships between the medical students so that they all came away with life-changing experiences, she added.

Clearly, the application process only attracts students who are already interested in working together, Wires said.

According to Eddin and Brosh, not many students applied this year, but they suggested that the uncertainty of a new program may have discouraged applicants.

Four medical students – Brosh, Ahmed Daraghma, Eddin, and Racheli Goldfarb – from the Middle East joined two Canadian participants – Rae Brager and Stephanie Thompson – in CISEPO's first student-driven initiative, said its director Arnold Noyek.

Now in its ninth year, CISEPO attempts to bring together Canadians, Israelis, Jordanians, Palestinians and other regional neighbours to work on projects associated with medicine and health care and, at the same time, contribute to peace-building in the Middle East.

The current program was partially funded in memory of David Noik, who overcame childhood cancer and then died of complications from the illness at the age of 50, Noyek said.

"Reporting on the physical, medical and psychosocial dimensions of childhood cancer" was an important element of the program, he said.

Eddin and Brosh spoke with The CJN with the understanding that politics would not be discussed.

Instead, they chose to talk about the experience of meeting each other, sharing aspects of their backgrounds, and the benefits of being able to work towards a common purpose – the healing of children with cancer.

"While we can't ignore our history, co-operating on a professional level with our so-called enemies allows us to focus on things that bind us rather than on our differences," Brosh said.

Brosh's grandparents on his mother's side are Holocaust survivors. On his father's side, the Haifa native is a 15th-generation Israeli from the Galilee. For centuries, Brosh's family interacted with their Arab neighbours. Yet, Brosh admitted that he has never had Palestinian friends before.

The Canadian program, which forced the students to wake up, study and discuss their work each day together, gave them a basis from which to share their personal expectations and future goals.

"After we got to know each other, it wasn't that difficult to discuss politics," Brosh said.

It's especially important right now "because both peoples are suffering, and we can't ignore that," he added.

Eddin, whose father was born in Jerusalem and whose mother was born in Amman, Jordan, admitted this is the first time he has had any direct interaction with Israelis.

The one-month program, which ended with the week at Camp Trillium, allowed him to develop friendships that he is hoping will continue when they get home.

"We talked about the political, cultural and religious aspects of each other's lives," within a broader context of helping children affected by cancer, the Muslim student said.

"Children are the ornaments of our lives and we gained from the experience of dealing with children and their families and learning to listen to their suffering," Eddin said.

Maybe this is the first step, he suggested hopefully. While the situation in Israel is difficult, Eddin is optimistic that Palestinian and Israeli universities will try to get together in the future to "do something on the medical and educational level."

"The true test [of the success of the program] will be when we get home," Brosh said.

Islamic terrorism not understood by newspapers, Montreal author claims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Newspapers do not generally understand the threat posed by Islamic fundamentalist terrorism and treat Israel unfairly, a Montreal writer claims in a new book.

Martin Kramer, author of Complicity: Terrorism in the News and a former Israel Government Press Office employee, studied the portrayal of terrorism in 24 North American, European and Israeli newspapers before reaching this verdict.

It's based on a close reading of headlines rather than text.

"Headlines are the responsibility of each paper," he said in an interview to promote his self-published book. "Articles are often lifted from [news] services. Thus, no paper can pass the buck on its headlines. A headline is often the only thing [a reader] sees and remembers."

In his view, newspapers are guided by an "outdated agenda" in which Islamic states are misleadingly regarded as pro-Western and open and free.

Only two of the newspapers he examined, the Jerusalem Post and the National Post, believe Islamic terrorism poses a "critical problem" to the West, Kramer, a McGill University graduate, concluded.

"The 22 other newspapers whitewashed terrorism continuously," he writes. "The U.S. press did not adjust collectively to anti-American attacks abroad, nor did it [regard] such assaults as something to which it felt its readers could relate."

Kramer suggests that in the decade prior to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the mainstream press "suppressed an awareness of terrorism" because it was not perceived as a "serious issue."

The media thereby prevented the public from demanding action from the government against terrorism, said Kramer, who edited the conservative, Montreal-based journal Dateline: Middle East in the late 1980s.

By lulling the public into complacency, the media was thereby complicit with the terrorists dispatched by Osama bin Laden, he charged.

According to Kramer, the media presents Israel as an aggressive, vengeful state.

"The Toronto Star is the worst of the Canadian papers I examined," he said.

The headlines he studied were often misleading, Kramer said, citing two examples.

When Palestinians razed Joseph's Tomb in Nablus in the first days of the current intifadah, the event was generally portrayed as a Palestinian takeover of a "holy site."

When three Israeli soldiers were kidnapped by Hezbollah in October 2000, the emphasis was on "violent clashes [spreading] to Lebanon."

Kramer had harsh words for the media's portrayal of Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority and chair of the PLO.

"Arafat is presented as the ultimate peacemaker. The Canadian media never links him to terrorism and only runs stories about him condemning terrorism."

In his study, Kramer also lambasted newspapers for being "soft" on Middle Eastern states such as Iran and Syria.

The public is partially to blame for "sloppy" reporting because it has not demanded "media accountability," he said.

Asked whether the media can be reformed, he replied: "I think it can if people won't tolerate lies and distortions any more."

He urges readers to send comments to his Web site, www.complicitybook.com.

Grieving mother unhappy with verdict

The courtroom procedures and rules, she said, are nothing more than "a game. I'm not playing a game. I live it. I don't believe it's justice. It's not justice."

Baranovski said she would prepare a letter to be read in court during the sentencing stage of the trial. (Last week, she and her husband Elliot Korczak, Matti's step-father, were quoted as calling for a sentence of at least 15 years.)

Lawyers for Mariani and Cochrane, who argued the evidence implicating their clients was as weak as that against Weiz, were reportedly considering a motion to return their clients to youth court, where they would face a maximum sentence of three years in jail. If they are successful, it would mean the two killers would be released immediately, since they have been in custody longer than that.

The court will convene Aug. 5 to set a date for sentencing.

Meanwhile, defence lawyers are also calling for an independent investigation into the Crown's star witness Lipschitz, who they say admitted to kicking Matti, perjured himself and counselled others to lie.

Weiz's Canadian lawyer, Marie Henein, called the charges against her client a miscarriage of justice deserving of compensation for the 3½ years of his life that were lost.

His Israeli lawyer, Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, who represented Weiz during a widely publicized extradition case, said police should be held accountable for basing their case on perjured testimony.

In Toronto, meanwhile, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, executive director of the Russian Jewish Community Centre, said the media deserves harsh criticism for the way it played up Weiz's service in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) during his extradition and prior to the trial, and then for ignoring it when he was acquitted.

"Now that he was acquitted, they don't say an Israeli soldier was acquitted, they say Daniel Weiz was acquitted. Is it fair? Is it right?"

Rabbi Zaltzman said Matti's murder "shook up our community because [Matti] was a member of our community... It's painful, very painful."

With the verdict now delivered, Rabbi Zaltzman said "I just hope it will give [Olga] some kind of closure and let her focus on the future of her life."

University of Toronto professor explodes enduring myth

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

University of Toronto political scientist Jeffrey Kopstein, claims he has exploded "one of the most potent myths of the 20th century" – the myth that a disproportionate number of Polish Jews during the interwar period were communists.

The myth, a variation on the "dual loyalty" slur that Jews are disloyal to their native countries, surfaced in Poland and elsewhere after 1918.

In Poland, where it was particularly entrenched and still remains in vogue, anti-Semitic Poles peddled the notion of a Jewish-communist conspiracy, known in Polish as Zydokomuna.

Kopstein and his colleague, Jason Wittenberg of the University of Wisconsin, are exploring this malicious and enduring myth within the context of a multi-country study on ethnic politics in Eastern Europe between the two world wars.

They published the first installment of their findings in a recent edition of the journal Slavic Review, and plan to write a book about the subject.

Their data demonstrates that Poland's Jews cast their lot with mainstream political parties in the 1922 and 1928 elections, the only free and fair ones between 1918 and 1939.

"In fact, only about seven per cent of Jews voted communist, far below the proportion of Ukrainians, Belarusians and Poles," discloses Kopstein.

Kopstein, who started the study about two years ago, is not surprised that the myth gathered force in Poland. "Poland had a difficult time in the past century," he explained.

Reconstituted as a state after World War I, Poland was brutally occupied by Germany in 1939 and subjected to Soviet hegemony and communism after 1945.

"So it is not surprising that many Poles blamed someone for their fate," he adds. "Jews were the perfect scapegoats. If you think about it, the whole notion of a conspiracy is an appealing one. It posits a hidden hand that controls things behind the scene. Communism was seen by many Poles as just one more Jewish vehicle for seizing power."

Prior to 1939, this myth was mainly propagated by the National Democrats (Endeks). "The Endeks were violently anti-Semitic and did not hesitate to spread all kinds of falsehoods about Jews," he observes. "But Catholic priests also nourished the sentiment in their weekly sermons."

During the post-war communist era, Polish nationalists and the Catholic Church were important reservoirs of the allegation that communism had been imposed on Poland and that its "domestic agents" were disproportionately Jews.

"Because there were several prominent communists with Jewish backgrounds after 1945, this was less silly than the previous myth of mass Jewish allegiance to communism, but it too, was greatly exaggerated," says Kopstein.

Jeffrey Kopstein

"There are some important issues of Jewish political behaviour that emerge from each of these countries and especially from comparing them," says Kopstein, whose current research is funded by the National Science Foundation in the United States and the Social Science and Humanities Research Council in Canada.

Before embarking on his latest project, he wrote The Politics of Economic Decline in East Germany, published in 1997 and based in part on his PhD dissertation.

In this book, he argues that East Germany, its huge apparatus of totalitarian repression notwithstanding, was basically powerless to reform its economy.

"The irony is that one of the most feared police states of the 20th century could not save itself by instituting the necessary changes to transform its economy into a dynamic one," says Kopstein, whose master's thesis examined Joseph Stalin.

Kopstein gathered material for The Politics of Economic Decline in East Germany in the Berlin archives of the communist party and the secret police.

The research gave him a vicarious thrill. "For years, I had studied the inner workings of communist countries. Now, all of a sudden, I had access to the deepest, darkest secrets of the most secretive of communist states, East Germany."

Apart from his duties as a professor, Kopstein is research director of the University of Toronto's Joint Initiative in German and European Studies. Last February, it co-sponsored a conference on anti-Semitism.

Kopstein, who taught at several elite American universities before coming to the University of Toronto last year, was born in Chatham, Ont. Joel, his father, owned a furniture store in Toronto. Marlene, his mother, is a screenwriter and a producer whose credits include Road to Avonlea and Emily of New Moon. Today, they divide their time between California and Toronto.

"We moved to the United States when I was 15 so that my mother could pursue a career in screenwriting," says Kopstein. "I finished high school in La Jolla, Calif., and received all my degrees from the University of California, Berkeley."

Kopstein, the father of two young boys, Max and Isaac, returned to Canada for a mix of reasons.

He and his wife, Simone – a Montrealer and a professor of political philosophy at the University of Toronto – missed their respective families.

"On the professional side, the opportunity to take up a professorship at the University of Toronto was a big draw. The U of T is a world-class institution with a long history and a well known strength in East European studies. I also wanted a larger group of Jewish students for whom my research on Jewish political life in pre-World War II Europe would be meaningful.

"It's not often that both personal and professional considerations coincide so nicely."

Community prepares for blitz by missionaries

Before that, an educational package will be made available to the public in the event that Jews for Jesus make telephone calls or go door to door to Jewish homes to spread their message. "There's a real possibility they'll do that," Rabbi Skobac said.

Andrew Barron, Canadian director of Jews for Jesus, told The CJN he didn't want to discuss the nuts and bolts of the Toronto campaign, such as how many volunteers will be here or what they will do, but rather the attempt by CJC and Jews for Judaism to stifle its message.

"Behold Your God is about talking to those Jewish people who want to talk about Jesus. We're simply going after an opportunity that rabbis have denied. We never said we promote or follow the Jewish religion. We're Jews who follow Jesus. God made us Jews.

"Suddenly, we're treated as outcasts and sinister people. We are the victims of intolerance, and that shows a real lack of rachmunis [mercy]. It's not the Jewish way," Barron said. "When they say we prey on vulnerable Jews, that demeans the Jewish community. I find that offensive as a Jew. There's no deception. We're up-front about it."

Barron said CJC's attempt to win the support of evangelical churches and calling on them to reject the tactics of Jews for Jesus reflects "a tyranny over the minority. We're not the ones doing the provoking. CJC is."

Last month, CJC sent a letter to some 850 mainline and evangelical Protestant churches in southwest Ontario, saying that while it understands the Christian mission to spread the "good news" of the Gospels, Jews for Jesus "engages in misleading practices;" is "shameless and dishonest;" and "fails [the] test of honesty as they continue to maintain there is little difference between Judaism and Christianity."

CJC called on the churches to repudiate the mission of Jews and Jesus and support the Jewish community.

As of last week, Congress received about 20 responses, most of them politely siding with Jews for Jesus, noting the group is not deceptive and is committed to ethical evangelism.

To date, three pastors have expressed solidarity with CJC in rejecting Jews for Jesus.

Some replies, though, were hostile. "So much for religious freedom!" hand-scrawled one pastor on CJC's letter. "When I was a drug addict, no one in the CJC ever told me about the mercy of God in the Torah!"

Kel Trudgian, senior pastor at Grace Church in Newmarket, wrote to say he found Congress's letter "offensive and a direct threat to the natural law of freedom of speech, association and religion."

CJC Ontario region's Len Rudner said he felt the churches did not understand Congress's distinction between the Christian mission to spread the Gospels, and the "dishonest" practices of Jews for Jesus.

"If someone says I'm going to hell if I don't accept Jesus, I have to acknowledge the honesty of that approach," Rudner said. "But if someone says I can be Jewish and accept Jesus, that's blurring the line."

According to Jews for Judaism, the Behold Your God campaign has converted 359 Jews to date, while another 9,450 Jews have expressed interest in more information.

Barron has a simple reply: "If you want to reject the message, it's a free country."

SFU student society rescinds anti-Israel policy

By ARIEL ZELLMAN
Special to The CJN

After a year of heated rhetoric and widespread anti-Israel propaganda at Simon Fraser University in Vancouver, British Columbia, a campus group has rescinded a controversial policy.

In early July, the Simon Fraser Student Society's (SFSS) constitutional policy review committee convened again to reassess its official policy of supporting the current Palestinian terror campaign against Israel.

Recently elected arts representative Brent Zacks, who is also the president of SFU's Israel Advocacy Committee, and other members of SFSS, had drafted a new resolution that they felt was more even-handed in its assessment of the Middle East conflict. They had hoped that the new resolution would replace the old one.

The original document, passed last February, read, "The Simon Fraser Student Society calls for the immediate end to the illegal U.S.-backed Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the right of return for all Palestinians to their homes, and an end to Israeli apartheid." The last draft of the resolution omitted the wording, "Long live the intifadah, long live Palestine, down with U.S. and Israeli imperialism."

Believing they had broad support for the new resolution, the students were surprised when it did not pass, but were even more shocked when the committee decided to completely table it, officially taking it off the policy books altogether.

"I didn't expect people to vote the way they did," Zacks said.

He said perhaps they discarded the resolution because of a documentary they saw on the violent reaction at Concordia University last September to a scheduled appearance by Finance Minister (at the time, former prime minister) Benjamin Netanyahu and because they had a sense that SFSS was getting embroiled in something beyond the interests of the students and the school.

"Maybe the video changed their minds, maybe they had an epiphany," Zacks said.

Either way, he said he is thrilled SFSS is finally taking a hands-off approach to the conflict.

But an article in the following issue of SFU's student newspaper, The Peak, carried the headline, "Student Union Bulldozes Palestine Policy," and quoted prominent campus anti-Israelists condemning the move, suggesting that heated debates will continue on campus.

But at least, said Zacks, "the SFSS will again be advocating for the students and not for their own personal political issues."

This move follows several others in recent months, including the almost complete turnover in May of the previous student government to new parties aimed at bringing SFSS back to campus issues, as well as successful Israel education awareness programs such as SFU's and the University of British Columbia's Israel Awareness Weeks and Israel Advocacy Shabbaton held in March. These programs were held in response to anti-Israel activities this past year at both campuses, such as SFU's anti-Israel "Dispelling Misconceptions: Media, Conflict & Imperialism in the Middle East" conference and the UBC-NDP's "Beyond the Headlines: Palestine/Israel" forum. Students involved in Israel advocacy are planning more programming and education campaigns for the coming year.

Western student forms alumni association

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Joshua Shuval has enjoyed the past four years at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) and his involvement with the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) so much that he's already involved in organizing a JSU Young Alumni Association – and he's still on campus this summer, finishing one last course for his Administrative and Commercial Studies degree.

Shuval, who served as JSU president in 2001-2002, said he's working with a committee of seven people on the new group's official launch, scheduled for Homecoming Weekend, the third weekend in September. It will feature a Shabbat dinner for alumni and students.

"Hopefully in February or March we'll have a larger affair in Toronto," Shuval said, noting the majority of Jewish students at Western are from Toronto.

The goal of the new network, Shuval said, is to "bring alumni of Western and the JSU together and 're-create' the sense of Jewish community feeling that they had during their years at Western."

In an initial contact letter, Shuval wrote that for many Jewish students, Western was "a place that empowered us to develop the leadership skills so important to us today. In particular, we were all able to make a contribution to the Jewish Students' Union, a way for us to give something back to the community."

He is hoping to get alumni involved again with the JSU and the university itself, which now has an estimated Jewish student population of 2,500.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED: The Jews for Jesus missionary organization is poised to target the Toronto Jewish community for three weeks this summer, beginning August 25, with "Behold Your God" – their most intensive and aggressive evangelistic crusade ever. They will use the media, billboards and a street campaign to flood our city with conversionary tracts directed toward Jews.

In response to this threat, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafletting campaign to alert and educate the public. We are seeking to train volunteers for our counter-missionary "Rapid Response Unit." JEWS FOR JUDAISM is seeking volunteers who will act as "Spotters" – who will notify us where and when the missionaries appear, or as "Counter-Leafletters" – who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner on the street beside the missionaries.

This campaign is scheduled to hit Toronto from Aug. 25 – Sept. 14. Montreal and Vancouver are slated for 2004 - 2005. If you would like to volunteer in our program and/or help support our vital work, please contact JEWS FOR JUDAISM.

Alliance MP Jason Kenney (fourth from right) with the families of Israelis being held by Lebanese terrorists.

Kenney queries feds on Lebanon grant

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Alliance MP Jason Kenney is calling on the federal government to explain why it has granted a Lebanese advocacy group that supports terrorist detainees in Israeli prisons more than $11,000 (US).

In a letter to Foreign Minister Bill Graham, Kenney asks whether "supporting this organization is the official policy of the Canadian government?

"If so, what similar support has the Canadian government offered to the organizations that work for the release of Israeli MIAs [missing in action] held by Hezbollah in Lebanon? What similar action has the Canadian government taken to help secure the release of Elchanan Tannenbaum, the Israeli citizen taken hostage by Hezbollah in October of 2000?" he asked.

Kenney, who represents Calgary Southeast, has introduced a motion in parliament calling on Canada to take "aggressive measures" against the governments of Lebanon, Syria and Iran to press for the release of Israeli army prisoners, some of whom have been held for close to 20 years, and for the release of Tannenbaum, an Israeli businessman in poor health whose whereabouts are unknown.

The governments of Syria, Lebanon and Iran are believed to have influence over Hezbollah, a Lebanon-based Islamic group that has been declared a terrorist organization by Ottawa.

Kenney said he was tipped to the $11,000 grant by the Lebanese organization's Web site (www.followupcsld-ip.org.lb). The site is run by the "Follow-up Committee for the Support of the Lebanese Detainees in the Israeli Prisons."

The organization claims Israel is holding 13 Lebanese "hostages," yet its own site describes the first person on its list of detainees, Samir Sami Qontar, as being "arrested on April 22, 1979, during an operation in Nahariya inside occupied Palestine. He's serving a life sentence in Nafha prison in the desert. He was sentenced into 542 years imprisonment."

The town of Nahariya is in northern Israel. Others on the list were caught during "operations" against Israeli forces in Lebanon or were arrested by Israeli security forces.

The Web site also features a description of "the visit of Ambassador Duval [of Canada] and the delegation of the embassy to the office of the Follow-up Committee [as] a confirmation of this friendship and a concrete and moral support for the issue of the detainees…"

The Web site says the ambassador presented "a grant of $11,421 U.S. supporting the activities of the committee." The money is for the purchase of two computers, the editing of eight reports about the condition of detainees and supporting two Web sites.

The site also notes that representatives of the Canadian Ministry of Justice met ex-detainees in Lebanon to gather information about former Lebanese militiamen who allegedly tortured them and who are now seeking asylum in Canada.

Kenney said he wants "to know why we're so concerned with terrorist, guerrilla detainees held legally."

Canada, he added, does not seem to see a distinction between Israel holding terrorists, who can be visited by the Red Cross and are subject to Israeli legal standards, and prisoners seized by Hezbollah who are held incommunicado.

"I've been able to get nowhere with the government on the Israeli MIA issue, so it seemed peculiar in the extreme that it would be giving money to this Lebanese organization," he said.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel, applauded Kenney for trying to raise the issue of missing Israelis.

"While not diminishing the substantial behind-the-scene activities of the Canadian government in support of the Israeli MIAs, Jason Kenney has to be commended for his leading role in raising awareness of the plight of the MIAs," said David Cooper, the CIC's assistant director of government relations.

Foreign Affairs spokesperson Marie-Christine Lilkoff said Canada supports the Lebanese NGO's humanitarian mandate, including its goal of rehabilitating ex-detainees and supporting their families' welfare.

"Our support was directed at these functions," she said. "Canada has worked to alleviate the suffering of victims on all sides of this conflict. We have also supported the families of Israeli detainees, and are continuing to follow their situation."

Looming Iranian threat to Mideast ignored

While the media's global focus is on the Israeli-Palestinian road map and the U.S. imbroglio in Iraq, important military developments in Iran are being given scant attention.

Israel has long maintained that Iran poses a far greater risk to Middle East stability than Iraq. Iran is officially dedicated to the destruction of Israel. It is the principal backer of Hezbollah, to the tune of $100 million (US) annually, and it is also the chief supporter of Islamic Jihad.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On July 20, according to an Associated Press report, Iranian leader Ayatollah Ali Khameni formally unveiled the domestically produced Shahab-3 (Shooting Star) ballistic missile. With a range of about 1,300 kilometers – capable of reaching Israel – and the ability to carry nuclear and other non-conventional warheads, the missile worries not only Israel, but also Europe and the United States.

At his recent meeting with the European foreign ministers in Belgium, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom warned that Iran "is today the biggest strategic threat to stability and peace in the Middle East, and indeed, to Europe." In a rare act of agreement with Israel, the EU concurred and issued a statement referring to the need to check Iran's nuclear ambitions.

The Shahab-3 has been under development for the past five years and is based on North Korea's No Dong surface-to-surface missile. While the missile is not yet fully accurate, it is assumed that with additional co-operation from North Korea, Iran will soon be able to produce an upgrade capable of hitting any target within a wide radius, including U.S. assets in Afghanistan, as well as Saudi Arabia, Turkey, and even southern parts of Europe.

The day after Iran announced the Shahab-3, Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz attempted to reassure his country that Israel's Arrow anti-missile defence system would be effective against Iran's weapons, including an advanced, nuclear-armed version of the Shahab.

As one of the few journalists paying attention to Iran's weapons program, Samuel Segev wrote the following in the Winnipeg Free Press on July 16: "Leaving aside the mud-slinging, disinformation and even sheer propaganda by all parties, one thing has become crystal clear: should Iran succeed in miniaturizing a nuclear weapon to fit into the Shahab's warhead, the regional balance of power in the Middle East would change beyond recognition." Segev's words are not merely alarmist. They reflect sober analysis within both the Israeli and U.S. strategic and defence communities.

Segev continues: "The testing of the Shahab came at a time when there is growing concern about Iran's nuclear ambitions. Contrary to the past, not only Israel but also the U.S. and its European allies are equally alarmed and are pressing for more intrusive and stricter inspections of Iran's nuclear facilities."

Segev recalls that on June 19, U.S. President George W. Bush warned (some might say threatened) that "the world would not tolerate the development of nuclear weapons in Iran."

It is certainly time for the international media to examine the looming threat from Iran. Since Iran is a signatory of the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), closer scrutiny might help push it to sign an additional protocol to the treaty that would allow UN inspectors to make more intrusive, extensive and short-notice checks of Iran's nuclear facilities. If Iran has no intention of building nuclear weapons, acceding to this inspection regimen would be one way of proving it.

Evangelical Christians plan fall solidarity mission

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A group made up largely of evangelical Christians from various denominations across Canada is planning a mission to Israel this fall to show solidarity with the Jewish state and to build better relations and understanding between Christians and Jews.

Calling their trip the "Together for Israel Mission," organizers Annie Elliott and Dean Bye say they can accommodate up to 300 people, and they hope Canadian Jews will join them.

The mission is scheduled for Oct. 9 to 19, which will enable Jews to celebrate Sukkot and Christians to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles in Israel. Participants will also be able to join the annual Jerusalem March, a parade through the capital attended by Jews and evangelical Christian from abroad each Sukkot for more than 20 years.

Elliott described the trip as a "grassroots event [that] is not sponsored by one Christian organization or one Jewish organization."

The Israeli Embassy in Ottawa recently hosted a meeting for representatives of various churches and faith organizations, as well as interested Jewish groups, to hear about the trip from Elliott and Bye.

Both have been involved in various pro-Israel evangelical Christian groups and both have been to Israel before.

In 2002, Bye participated in a mission of 17 Christians and 24 Jews who "left Toronto for Israel and embarked on a journey that would change our lives," he said.

"We were the first group that asked to have dinner at the Park Hotel, the scene of the Passover massacre two months before," an experience he found deeply moving, he said, referring to the scene of a Hamas suicide bombing that killed 30 Jews sitting down to a Passover seder in March 2002.

Elliott has been involved in various leadership roles in churches and Christian organizations for 24 years and is on the national leadership team of Watchmen for the Nations, an organization of evangelical church leaders from across Canada. She also participated in last year's Jerusalem March.

"It was one of the highlights of my spiritual journey as 20,000 Jews and Christians, comprised of 15,000 Israeli citizens and pilgrims together with 5,000 Christians from 200 nations, marched in solidarity with Israel proudly waving flags and colourful banners with exuberant cheering and joyful celebration in the streets of Jerusalem.

"I personally felt compelled to come back to Canada and rally as many Canadian Jews and Christians to travel to Israel together to be a strong delegation representing our nation."

Anna-Lee Chiprout, a longtime employee of the Israeli Embassy who is going on the mission, has known Elliott for a number of years and the two have become friends.

"We have formed a wonderful, close friendship and even though we come from two different worlds, through two different paths, something drew us to each other and we have respect for each other's religions. It has been our dream to be able to walk hand in hand in friendship and love for Israel down the streets of Jerusalem," she said.

Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon pledged support for the mission, "as an Israeli, as a Jew, as someone who believes in very strong relations with the Christian community and as a Jerusalemite."

B.C. court considers extraditing Seifert to Italy

VANCOUVER — A B.C. Supreme Court judge is considering whether to order the extradition of convicted Nazi war criminal Michael Seifert to Italy.

Last week, the evidentiary portion of Seifert's extradition hearing ended with federal prosecutor Roger McMeans recounting the details of 11 murders for which Seifert was convicted in absentia by an Italian military court in 2000.

According to the Vancouver Sun, McMeans presented a deposition from a former prisoner who described how he witnessed Seifert and his colleagues beat and then shoot two fellow prisoners.

"Then we we went out to clean, because the Red Cross was due to arrive," the prisoner, Giovanni Boni, stated in the deposition.

Another former prisoner, Maria Teresa Scala, described how Seifert and another guard tortured and killed a 50-year-old Jewish woman. "She was murdered only because she was Jewish. Her daughter arrived the next morning looking for her mother, but she was strangled by the two torturers," Scala said in her statement.

McMeans, who is representing the Italian government, pointed out Seifert was also convicted of gouging out the eyes of a teenage prisoner.

Seifert, however, denied the allegations.

"I never killed anybody," he said under questioning from defense lawyer Doug Christie.

Speaking in response to questions from Christie, Seifert said he never heard prisoners screaming from torture and he never heard shots in the camp. "Nobody shot nobody," he said.

Under further questioning, Seifert denied each charge levelled against him in his Italian trial.

"Did you see any cruel or unusual treatment of those prisoners?" Christie asked.

"No," Seifert replied.

A native of Landau, Ukraine, Seifert testified he first became a guard in 1943 at a facility in his native Ukraine, where he swore an oath to "the Fuehrer, the people and the fatherland."

Seifert acknowledged that after he was transferred to Bolzano, which had been established in 1944 as a transit camp for deportees destined for death camps, he was convicted of raping a local woman. He was imprisoned from September 1944 until his court martial in December, he said, rejecting other evidence that he was able to come and go from his cell and was able to keep a weapon with him.

A retired sawmill worker, Seifert has lived in Canada since 1951.

White supremacists running for municipal office

Canadian Jewish Congress is alerting voters in upcoming Ontario municipal elections that several avowed white supremacists are running for office.

In Ottawa, Donna Upson, founder of the Canadian branch of the National Socialist Movement and a supporter of racial segregation is running for mayor.

Upson served 13 months of a two-year sentence for threatening to kill the pastor of a predominately black congregation in Dartmouth, N.S. She is also a member of the Nationalist Party of Canada, the political heir of the Western Guard, and in an interview with the Ottawa Citizen, she acknowledged she has received campaign money from supporters of both the Ku Klux Klan and the National Socialist Movement.

In Toronto, perennial mayoralty candidate Don Andrews is again seeking the city's top job. Andrews has served two jail terms, one for conspiracy to create mischief and possession of explosives and one for wilfully promoting hatred of non-whites.

While much of Andrews' campaign platform focuses on typical urban issues, its top item promises to introduce a motion to officially proclaim European Heritage Week in the city.

Jim Brookman is running for councillor in Ward 30 – Toronto-Danforth and Bob Smith is a candidate for councillor in Ward 31 – Beaches-East York. Smith is a member of the Nationalist Party of Canada and was convicted along with Andrews of hate activities; Brookman is described on the Nationalist Party Web site as a party activist.

"We are sending out a message, spreading it far and wide only to inform the electorate," said Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber.

"They are attempting to use the democratic process to raise the profile of so-called white racialism," said Frank Bialystok, CJC's chair of community relations in Ontario.

Young leadership award winners, retired businessman to lead Winnipeg 2003 CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second year in a row, semi-retired businessman Mel Lazareck will be chairing Winnipeg's annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign.

But the women's campaign will have a new look this year: its three first-time co-chairs are close friends, and two are former community young leadership award winners.

Ivy Kopstein was one of the winners in 2001 while Glenna Kay won in 1998. They are joined as co-chairs by Sherry Lercher Davis. The threesome first worked together on the federation's Family Matters program, a yearly one-day seminar for women initiated four years ago.

"I guess because we all still have young kids, the federation thought it would be easier if all three of us shared the position," Kopstein says.

Last year's overall campaign brought in $4,130,500, about $345,000 more than the year before and about $1 million more than four years ago, when Federation/CJA began a determined effort to raise revenues.

This year's goal is $4.3 million. "We can see that with the growing anti-Semitism in the world, if we don't do for ourselves, nobody will do for us," Lazareck says. "We can't pass on our responsibilities to anyone else."

For its part, the women's campaign aims to raise $1 million over the next five years.

"We also want to increase awareness of communal needs," Kopstein says. "We are not sure that people know where the money is going and we want to get the message out. We also want to involve more younger women."

Overall revenues may be up, but some federation board members are concerned allocations are not keeping pace. Last year, for example, despite the additional funds raised during the campaign and an additional $155,000 in interest earned on investments, only $85,000 more was available for beneficiary agencies than in 2001.

The principal reason is the CJA's "designated gifts" program, the pros and cons of which were debated at Federation/CJA's board of directors meeting at the end of May.

The program was introduced four years ago as a way to help increase CJA campaign revenues. The idea is that big givers may be more generous if they have a say in where their gifts go. But the drawback has turned out to be that the recipients are not necessarily the usual CJA beneficiaries.

A large chunk of the Asper family's donation last year, for example, was designated for the Asper Foundation's annual Holocaust and Human Rights Studies Program, which subsidizes yearly visits by Grade 8 students from Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, as well as Grade 9 students, both Jewish and non-Jewish, to the United States Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C. The amount designated last year for this purpose was $340,500, compared to $46,500 the year before.

Signs of new concessions as Sharon in U.S. for Bush talks

By GIDEON ALON, MAZAL MUALEM and AMOS HAREL
Haaretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — New Israeli concessions to the Palestinians were in the works as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon landed in Washington Monday for talks with U.S. President George Bush and senior administration officials.

Diplomatic sources accompanying Sharon said Israel was planning to release 540 Palestinian prisoners in the coming week, including 210 Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists, 210 Fatah members and 120 Palestinians jailed on criminal offences.

As a further sign of concession, some 18,000 Gaza residents were expected to pass through the Erez terminal at the northern border to go to jobs in Israel on Monday, Israel Radio reported. The 18,000 permits were to be granted to labourers, with an additional 2,000 permits given to merchants for transfer of goods through the Karni terminal.

In the West Bank, 3,000 work permits were granted to Bethlehem residents, with an additional 1,000 for merchants; and 500 permits were granted to residents of Tul Karm for agricultural work.

The figures represent a marked increase over the number of workers allowed out of Gaza and the West Bank during most of the nearly three-year uprising.

Israel has also removed a number of West Bank roadblocks in recent days.

On Sunday, the cabinet voted 14-9 to approve Sharon's proposal to release 100 Hamas and Islamic Jihad prisoners, just hours before Sharon departed for Washington.

Israel's ambassador to the United States Danny Ayalon, speaking to Israel Radio as Sharon landed in Washington Monday, turned aside speculation that Bush would press the visiting prime minister to alter the route of the security fence.

Ariel Sharon

"I am still not sure that [the security fence issue] will be raised by the president," said Ayalon.

Palestinians fear the route of the fence, which during Sharon's premiership has been changed to include areas of the West Bank beyond the pre-1967 war demarcation lines, is intended to unilaterally set the borders of their future state by ensuring that settlement blocs and other tracts of West Bank land are on the Israeli side of the barrier.

Bush expressed concern over the fence after talks with Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas at the White House last Friday.

"It is very difficult to develop confidence between the Palestinians and Israel with a wall snaking through the West Bank," Bush said.

Ayalon noted that when the fence issue was raised during a visit last month by Bush's national security adviser Condoleezza Rice, "she did not voice any opposition to the basic position of a separation fence as a security response to the terror of suicide bombers. They were certainly interested in speaking about the pace [of construction] or the route, but here also this will not head the agenda."

Ayalon said he was certain that mutual agreement would be reached with Washington over the fence, "even if it does not come during this visit. I don't think that there is any special urgency to reach agreement over the fence specifically today or tomorrow," he said.

Body of IDF soldier found near Arab villages

By URI ASH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The body of an IDF soldier, Cpl. Oleg Shaichat, who has been missing for a week, was found buried in an olive grove between the Arab villages of Kafr Kana and Mashad in the north of Israel, police reported Monday.

According to the initial investigation, police said Shaichat was abducted at the Beit Rimon Junction and then taken to a nearby field, where he was murdered.

According to Northern District Police Commander Maj.-Gen. Yaakov Borovsky, the body was found by volunteers searching the area. Borovsky said searches concentrated on that specific area after Shaichat's belongings, which he apparently left behind on purpose, were found nearby.

Borovsky said he could not give many details about the condition of the body or any other details on the case, because of a court-imposed gag order. Israel Radio reported that judging from the condition of the body, Shaichat had fought back. His gun was not discovered and is believed to have been stolen by his assailants.

"The motive for the murder was nationalistic. We do not yet know the identity of the murderers, and therefore the question of whether they were Israeli Arabs or Palestinians remains open," Borovsky said.

Israel's Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Monday, "I don't want to reach any conclusions until we have studied all the evidence."

Hundreds of police, soldiers and volunteers had scoured the north of the country in the last week looking for the missing soldier..

Six of Iraq's last Jews brought to Israel from Baghdad

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Six elderly Jews from Iraq, from among the last remaining Jews in the country, landed last Friday evening in Israel on a direct flight from Baghdad.

The six were flown to Israel as part of a joint operation of the Jewish Agency, the organization responsible for bringing Jews to Israel, and the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), a Jewish-American international migration and refugee resettlement agency that provides humanitarian aid to Jews around the world.

Iraq once had a thriving community of some 130,000 Jews. Between 1949 and 1952, around 120,000 made their way to Israel, with smaller numbers of Jews leaving the country in subsequent years.

Among the six is a 99-year-old woman and her 70-year-old daughter, another 70 year-old woman who was the last remaining Jew in the southern Iraqi city of Basra, and a blind 90-year-old former Baghdad resident.

Their names, along with the names of the other two, were not released until they landed in Israel.

Before Friday's mission, 34 Jews were found in Iraq by an agency envoy who visited the country after the U.S.-led defeat of Saddam Hussein's government, said Giora Rom, the agency's director-general.

The other 28 Iraqi Jews did not want to come to Israel, said Rom, speaking on Israel's Channel Two, adding that the agency had provided those who had stayed behind with religious articles.

Wiesenthal Center fights Oxfam boycott of Israeli agriculture

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Faced with a boycott targeting Israeli agricultural products, the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) has launched a boycott campaign of its own.

Last week, the centre's Canadian office unveiled a multi-pronged approach to allow its members to register their dissatisfaction with Oxfam International, the worldwide famine relief organization, for a campaign that originated with Oxfam-Solidarité, the organization's Belgian wing.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs of Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said the centre is calling on its supporters to consider charitable alternatives to Oxfam Canada, one of 12 Oxfam affiliates worldwide. It's also urging its members to avoid purchasing Belgian products, including diamonds and agricultural products, and it suggests avoiding Belgium as a vacation destination.

In its most visible response to Oxfam's campaign, the centre is also urging members to sign an online petition asking the relief organization to drop its boycott.

Earlier this summer, Oxfam-Solidarité joined 15 Belgian NGOs in a boycott campaign against Israeli products. A graphic on the Oxfam-Solidarité Web site featured a picture of a grapefruit dripping red juice in the form of a teardrop, underlined with the caption: "Israeli fruit tastes bitter. Say no to the occupation of Palestine. Don't buy any fruit from Israel."

Angered by the graphic, the Wiesenthal Center quickly wrote to Ian Anderson, chair of the Oxfam International Secretariat in London, calling the online poster discriminatory.

"This obscene campaign recalls an earlier one, when during the Second World War, Belgian Nazis exhorted the public, 'Do not buy Jewish products,'" the letter states. "This boycott effort, which we reached through the main Oxfam Web site, violates your provisions against ethnic and racial discrimination."

In a response, Anderson said Oxfam supports the U.S.-sponsored "road map" peace plan and condemns Palestinian suicide bombings and all other acts of terror and violence.

"We want our campaigns to be challenging, but never offensive, and we apologize for any offence that has been caused."

Anderson's letter noted the Belgian affiliate had amended its Web site to include "a measured explanation of its own involvement in this Belgian campaign… Its Web site also now makes clear… that Oxfam-Solidarité's involvement in the campaign was to target only those goods grown in the occupied territories and exported to the European Union. As such, the campaign is against certain actual policies of the Israeli government. It is not against the Israeli or Jewish people."

Adler called Oxfam's response inadequate.

The claim by Oxfam-Solidarité that it was aimed at goods from the territories is not believable, he said, since there is no way to distinguish them from grown-in-Israel produce.

"It's always disappointing when a good charity that does good work tries to involve itself in politics. You ask, where are they when there's a civil war in Liberia? I don't see them taking a side there, and there's starvation there."

Mofaz: Arrow can counter Iranian missile threat

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz reassured Knesset members last Monday that Israel's Arrow missile defense system is able to counter any threat by Iranian missiles, and he promised missile defence would not be affected by budget cuts.

The previous day, Iran equipped its elite revolutionary guards with a locally-made ballistic missile, the Shihab-3. The missile, with a range of about 1,300 kilometers, is capable of reaching Israel and U.S. forces in Saudi Arabia and Turkey.

Since the 1991 Gulf War, Israel – with U.S. financial backing – has developed the Arrow anti-missile system, the only operational one in the world.

The Arrow-2 missile was successfully tested in August 2001, when it shot down a missile dropped from an Israeli Air Force F-15 fighter at high altitude on the path of an incoming Scud missile.

The Shihab-3's deployment came as Iran faces mounting scrutiny of a nuclear energy program Washington says may be fronting a covert bid to make atomic arms. The missile was unveiled in a military parade before Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who heads the country's armed forces. The missile's deployment comes after its final testing several weeks ago, Iranian officials said.

Also last Monday, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom accused Tehran of "trying to do everything" to build a nuclear weapon and warned Iran would pose a threat to the whole world unless it was stopped. Speaking after a meeting in Brussels with his European Union counterparts, he said Iran was enriching uranium and refusing to accept tougher inspections of its nuclear program.

"I think the EU should take a key role in the last efforts to prevent them from having [nuclear weapons]," Shalom said.

Later the same day, Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi denied Tehran was seeking to build a nuclear weapon, saying it was Israel that represented a nuclear threat to the region.

Iran also said last Monday it has no intention of pulling out of the Iranian hardliners to do so.

The Week in Israel

July 21

• The cut in the 2004 budget will be primarily in defence and government ministries said Ori Yogev, head of the budget department in the Finance Ministry. Yogev refused to say how broad a cut is planned for next year's budget. However, there is a general consensus among economists that some NIS 7-9 billion will be cut and about NIS 4-5 billion will come from the defence budget.

July 22

• PA President Yasser Arafat called Jewish visits to the Temple Mount a "big crime." He made his comments to Palestinian children at a summer camp in Ramallah. Visits by Jews and some non-Jewish tourists have resumed in the past two months for the first time since September 2000. He said visits by Jews could have "grave consequences."

July 23

• A ministerial committee authorized the release of 530 Palestinian prisoners, including members of Hamas and Islamic Jihad in the coming days. A senior Hamas official said Israel would pay a price if it did not release Hamas members during the three-month ceasefire.

July 24

• Police intensified the search for a missing soldier, with concern growing that he had been kidnapped. Oleg Sheichat, 20, of Upper Nazareth was last heard from July 21.

July 25

• Israel announced a series of humanitarian gestures toward the Palestinians. Among the moves announced are the removal of three key West Bank checkpoints, the reopening of roads in the West Bank and the transfer of NIS 72 million in tax money and the issuing of 8,500 permits for Palestinians to enter Israel to work.

The Na Laga'at company in performance.

Hearing and seeing is believing

By BARRY DAVIS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — In a country that has experienced more than its fair share of conflict, with a resulting commensurately high number of physically disabled, the Israeli public is used to providing for people with special needs. Even so, the Na Laga'at ("Do Touch") acting company is a unique group.

Early next month, Aug. 5-10, Jerusalemite actress and director Adina Tal will make a presentation about Na Laga'at at the 13th annual Deaf Blind International Conference to be held in Mississauga, Ont.

Tal's Canadian visit follows a similar presentation she made in March this year, at a British conference on the subject of Charge Syndrome and Ushers Syndrome. Most of the Na Laga'at group suffer from the latter, a degenerative ailment that causes hearing impairment at birth, or in early childhood, developing into profound deafness. The person's sight is later similarly impaired.

"The other people at the conference in England couldn't believe the things we'd achieved with the group in Israel," Tal recalls. "They had never encountered anything like the Na Laga'at group before."

Four years ago, Tal began working with a dozen severely visually and hearing impaired adults with varying degrees of thespian aspirations. Even with almost a quarter of a century of theatre work behind her, Tal says Na Laga'at presented her with professional and logistical problems for which she absolutely had no training.

"I had no previous experience at all of working with disabled people," she says. "You walk into a room with people, most of whom can't see or hear you. It's a daunting moment."

Tal came across the group at a centre for the visually and hearing impaired in Tel Aviv in 1999. The center had received a donation for the specific purpose of establishing an amateur dramatics group, but the activity started to wind down as the funds ran out. What Tal got was a bewildering encounter with 12 physically disabled adults with almost no acting experience, and with whom she had no way of communicating her directives. Her protégés had to climb a steep learning curve before she could lick them into shape.

Three and a half years later, Na Laga'at began performing a musical comic drama, called Light Is Heard in Zig Zag, at major venues around Israel. To date, they have appeared more than 20 times [illegible] to packed houses, and there are more bookings for the coming months.

When you have to work with actors with whom you cannot communicate directly, the pitfalls often become a nightmare. The more severely disabled actors are constantly escorted by interpreters. When Tal barks out a directive – she admits to expending an enormous amount of physical and vocal energy in her work on a production – the interpreters transmit her instructions, via touch sign language, by tapping out the words on the actors' hands.

It is the same during the performance itself. Although they are, by now, well-rehearsed, most of the actors have no way of knowing exactly what is happening on the stage at any given moment. As the next scene kicks in, the interpreters inform their thespian wards of the transition, and the actors take it from there. Observing the actors perform and interact with each other onstage, it is hard to believe they have to contend with such severe physical limitations. Even Tal admits she has doubts.

"Somewhere, deep inside, I am not entirely convinced they can't really hear or see me," she says. "But things happen that I can't explain. I'm not a mystical person. Sometimes, I do an exercise with them and when I shout 'Stop!' they all stop without hearing me. I can't explain that."

Ultimately, it is hoped Na Laga'at – financial backing willing – will have its own arts and cultural centre staffed by people with visual and hearing impairments. The group recently received suitable premises at a preferential rental rate. But then disaster struck. The day after the group's manager, Eran Gur, received the key, the whole building burnt down. So the search for a new site, and financial support, has been renewed.

"I believe we can offer the world something special," says Tal. "There is no reason why a centre in Israel shouldn't spawn branches all over the world for people with sight and hearing disabilities."

More than anything, Tal says she wants the actors to have strong self-esteem and feel they are capable of contributing something to society. After a recent performance of Light is Heard in Zig Zag at Jerusalem's Israel Museum, a high school girl approached Tal and told her that she started out watching the show feeling sorry for the actors but, by the end, she looked up to them.

"That's what it's all about," Tal says.

Soulpepper's No Man's Land showcases two Canadian greats

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Refreshing is not a word that would likely be used to describe a mysterious play written by a 72-year-old British playwright that features two grizzled veterans of Canadian theatre.

But Harold Pinter's No Man's Land, being staged by Soulpepper at Toronto's Harboufront Centre, carries itself with both dignity and sizzle, a combination that elevates the production into the must-see category.

Peter Donat as Hirst.

Pinter's style of creating manipulative characters who lock horns in power struggles figures prominently in this 1974 script, which was written for British acting greats Ralph Richardson and John Gielgud.

Now, Toronto audiences are being treated to the acting acumen of Canadian theatre lions William Hutt and Peter Donat. Hutt plays philosophizing poet Spooner, and Donat envelops himself in the impassive essayist Hirst. The two past-their-prime writers drink at Hirst's London home one night, trading clever quips and emotional attacks.

Between intense moments, the audience is left wondering: Who is telling the truth, and do these two people even know each other? Add the shuffling Hirst's two brutish caretakers, Briggs (Michael Hanrahan) and Foster (Stuart Hughes), and the play shifts from human expressions as crass as intimidation to fears of reviving "old ghosts."

Hirst's reliance on memory leaks into Spooner's sermonizing on artistic integrity, sending both word-crafters into spirals of debate. In the first act, Hutt flexes his impeccable diction while delivering mini-monologues to a speechless Donat. The lines are often as witty as the unobtrusive physical comedy — Donat's cheek-twitching becomes a subtle sign to swig some more alcohol.

William Hutt as Spooner.

Watching the two theatre legends banter in the second act is poetry in motion (Hutt is a Stratford regular and Donat has ranged from Broadway to Stratford to Soulpepper's Don Carlo).

And when Pinter weaves poetic musicality into his script, freeing the actors from his patented long silences, the play soars with suspense and eloquence. Pinter's words, though, can sometimes be less effective than these actors' expert non-verbal expression – indeed, the tension of one Huttian glance can convey a mouthful of grumbling asides.

Director Albert Schultz, who is also Soulpepper's artistic director, keeps the pace taut and allows his principals to shine. A lesser director might have confined Hutt's smirking retorts and caged Donat's eye-catching presence.

Hirst and Spooner trade clever quips.

It's been said that Pinter, who was born to a Jewish tailor and his wife in East London, wrote Hirst as a nightmarish extension of whom he might become — a whiskey-swilling writer left spiritually empty and creatively depressed. Donat imparts those fears and more: while thinking out loud about his past glories, eyes cast upward, he barks for his servant to bring over the bottle of whiskey, and he gulps down an impressive amount to douse the intruding cobwebs.

The two men of letters describe no man's land as an icy limbo of no change, no growth, with Hirst remarking, "In my day, nobody ever changed."

But one thing has changed for Toronto theatre lovers: they can now watch two remarkable actors dance over the thought-provoking words of a major playwright. This No Man's Land is a symbol of artistic growth, not only for Shultz's company, but also for two of Canada's premier actors in the twilight of their careers.

The play runs until Aug. 23. For tickets call 416-973-4000.

CHINSKY TELLS STORIES OF OLD TORONTO IN "THE TAILOR'S DAUGHTER"

Toronto freelance writer Miriam Chinsky, whose byline has appeared often in The CJN and other publications for decades, has written many delightful historical articles about life in the north Toronto of half a century ago and more.

Chinsky grew up north of the Yonge-Eglinton area, where her father, a custom tailor, usually kept a store. "We always lived within walking distance of the store so he could come home for lunch," she recalls.

Some of her best articles have been gathered into a collection that is scheduled for publication under the title The Tailor's Daughter by Chestnut Publications in October.

"It tells you what it was like growing up in north Toronto in the '30s and '40s — which is very different than what it's like now," Chinsky says, adding wryly that she's starting to feel a bit "like Grandmother Moses."

Local comic helps Torontonians chase their dreams

By DAVE GORDON
Special to the CJN

Two years ago, Ieden Wall had a dream: to make the dreams of others come true.

Today, using a camera and a chauffeur, Wall is mixing raw earnestness and nerves of steel to explore the path to people's secret ambitions.

The result is a bare-bones production called The Dream Chaser, a maverick approach to the "man on the street" interview that uses massive doses of chutzpah to help unknown dreamers pursue their life-long goals.

The segments – which Wall shows on big screens at live performances in informal café-like environs – are unscripted and offer audiences a fusion of slick, wry humour and gritty human drama on the streets of Toronto.

To add an air of elegance to the proceedings, Wall uses a chauffeur to shuttle himself and the dreamer on their quest.

The goal? To show that anything is possible.

There are two aspects that are equally fulfilling about The Dream Chaser, Wall says.

"First, being able to step into someone's life at a low point or moment of vulnerability and motivate them to go the distance. Second, to create a show that flies in the face of convention using humour to inspire others to chase their dreams with a greater tenacity," says the 30-year-old Wall, who also does some standup comedy.

Wall has nurtured his networking and interviewing skills since the age of 15, when he would talk to celebrities on camera and then publicly screen the interview. Wall also had a brief stint as host of his own show on cable television.

American audiences have turned the charismatic talk-show renegade into a campus cult favourite. His show was a smash hit at Penn State, the University of Pittsburgh, UCLA and Stanford University.

The sometimes-edgy Dream Chaser keeps its groove by regularly refreshing its roster of "dream" segments.

So far, Wall has helped a waitress become a cover model and a fledgling chanteuse audition for a Broadway show, and he has helped a veteran subway singer follow his dream of signing with a major label.

When he began the project, naysayers tried to deter him.

"Everybody we spoke to told us the concept was unrealistic. But now tens of thousands of people are writing letters and e-mails and want their dreams fulfilled," says Wall.

His partner, Brian Korson, has also helped out by loaning more than $500,000 worth of digital equipment and donating hundreds of hours of his time, and sometimes even risking his own safety, to shoot and produce the six Dream Chaser pieces he and Wall have made so far.

It's that kind of selflessness that Wall sees as Dream Chaser's raison d'être.

"Tikkun olam was a concept that was taught to us by our grandparents at a very young age. The concept of mending a broken world is a tall task, but through The Dream Chaser I can do this in a very unique way," Wall says.

"By reaching out to dreamers who have a broken wing or have endured great adversity, I can repair some of the damage or lift some of their baggage, and that is what being Jewish is all about."

On Thursday Aug. 7 at 7 and 9 p.m., the Carlton Cinemas will showcase The Dream Chaser. As well, a segment in which Wall helps someone escape from a mental institution to pursue their dream of becoming an actor will be shown this fall at the Toronto International Film Festival.

Phil Pivnick has a Purpose for his playwrighting

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to the CJN

When Phil Pivnick speaks, his brain spews ideas faster than his mouth can handle them.

Listening to him is not only an exercise in attentiveness but a lesson on idea-generating — the 24-year-old playwright seems to overflow with notions on life's meaning, on finding a passion to dive into, on discovering a purpose.

Phil Pivnick

And how appropriate that Pivnick's first play (which he also directed) debuted at the Toronto Fringe Festival recently under the title Purpose.

Like Pivnick's own late-night reflections, the play's main character seeks answers to questions on his role in the world.

Alex (Brian Froud) ponders, quite existentially, how to elevate himself above normalcy.

"I had a conversation with my friend about meeting our Creator, and how intriguing that would be," Pivnick says. "I think it's impossible for us to get away from our desire to search for God."

He calls his one-hour play a marriage of Samuel Beckett and Woody Allen, citing Allen and Steve Martin as his main comedic influences. The tone of Purpose carries that Allen-like self-reflection, and punchlines centre on boy-girl foibles with tight sharpness. Pivnick directs little action into the script, instead allowing the dialogue to convey the suspense, drama and comedy.

And brains need not be checked at the door. "These are real characters with strong humour mixed with intelligence," says Pivnick, a Toronto resident transplanted from Kingston.

Pivnick cut his comedic teeth as a stand-up comedian, jumping on open mike stages in Montreal while taking English at Concordia University. After switching to York University for film and then creative writing, he wrote the initial script for Purpose for his final year project. He penned the tale with the Fringe Festival in mind, plotting few props and set pieces to accommodate the annual 900-show festival.

Winning a feature at the Fringe by chance (since applicants vie for spots through a lottery system), Pivnick found a purpose for his graduate life — apart from the doldrums of working retail. Rehearsing three times a week, and seeking assistance from every friend he could think of, Pivnick slaved over his play in June, wishing for enough packed houses to finance an off-Fringe production.

The administration weighed down his days, and he credits his time at B'Nai Brith Youth Organization for learning how to stay focused and open-minded. "To give you a sense of how organized you had to be," he says, "when you join BBYO, you have to buy a briefcase."

Pivnick aspires to be a full-time TV writer, claiming he entered theatre life "because developing a TV series is so difficult to do at my age it's almost impossible."

That practicality is another symptom of the logical mind Pivnick reveals; but impish grins interrupt his word flow, and he dreams out loud, "Y'know, I want to leave something behind. My goal is to get a five-minute segment on Entertainment Tonight."

Like his character Alex who hungers for purpose to his life — even though that epiphany could be closer than thought — Pivnick has found his path. The graduate finds himself thrust into an opportunistic world, looking to cement his future via the words swimming furiously in his head.

Ron Wiseman is a man of many styles

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

It's a sweltering summer afternoon and the sounds and smells of Toronto's Kensington Market waft through the open door of the Anshei Minsk Congregation where Ron Wiseman prepares for his last performance in Canada.

The reggae singer says his music is a lot like a stroll through the eclectic downtown neighbourhood that he has frequented for roughly 20 years.

"You walk down the street here and you'll hear reggae bass and it mixes in with some Portuguese ballad and sometimes you can stand at a certain point between three corners and you'll hear three types of music and it's pretty wild," Wiseman, 43, says. "I'm a man of many hats, many styles."

After performing at the Minsk for nearly two decades, the Winnipeg native has decided to "move the party" to Israel.

"Anything I'm doing here I can do better there. It's the land of opportunity," he says.

Wiseman's newest album, Mystical Mood, was released in May by Phase I Studios. While he has released several home-recorded albums, this one is his first studio-produced record.

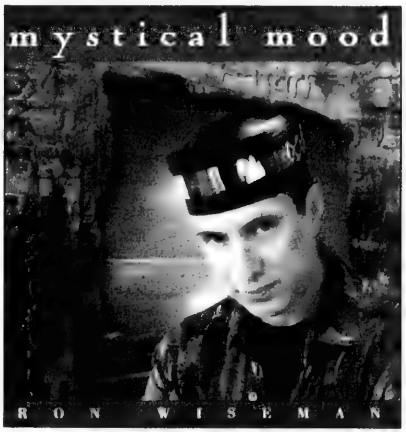
Wiseman says he fell in love with the reggae sound as a youngster in Winnipeg.

"It's a music where every instrument knows its place," he says. "It's a music that has a lot of space, not a lot of talking."

Mystical Mood features the heavy bass and percolated guitar riffs typical of most reggae music, but by using klezmer-style clarinets and Middle-Eastern instrumentation, Wiseman gives the album a distinctly Jewish sound.

Unlike reggae artists such as Bob Marley, Wiseman does not focus on politics, but rather draws his inspiration from the Torah.

"There are laws that transcend politics. I believe in a higher rulership. Problems in the world don't have to do with this system or that system... You find truth wrapped up in smaller packages. Reading words of Torah, it's sort of like every letter is significant."



In Israel, Wiseman will give weekly performances on top of Mount Zion, where King David, a source of his inspiration, was buried.

"David Hamelech is the ultimate Jew and the ultimate king and the ultimate human being. He was a soldier, a scholar, a dancer, a singer, a lover. He was a well-rounded individual," says Wiseman, adding it was the king's openness and versatility that made him such a great ruler.

He says he tries to carry some of these attributes into his playing: he rarely rehearses and prefers to go with the flow.

At his last show in Winnipeg, he says, he only met his saxophonist and drummer five minutes before going onstage, but managed to pull off a seamless performance.

"I'm mister improv," he says. "If I have good players, it works."

As for songwriting, he says there is no one right way to do it.

"My brother knew two very good writers. One was Leonard Cohen and the other was Alan Ginsberg. He asked Leonard Cohen, 'What is the rule in writing songs?' and Leonard Cohen said, 'The first thought is the best thought.' And so when he saw Alan Ginsberg, he asked the same question, and he said, 'The last thought is the best thought.' I basically agree with both of them.

"What I strive for in a song is that it's simple and you can carry it with you," he says.

Film chronicles American tragedy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I had a good family," laments Elaine Friedman, still puzzled and devastated over the dreadful turn of events that nearly ruined her life. "Where did this come from?"

The question she poses so plaintively lies at the core of Andrew Jarecki's fluid, thought-provoking documentary, Capturing the Friedmans, which opened in Toronto last week.

The story of the Friedman clan, which is told in incremental fashion, is an American tragedy that raises relevant questions about the nature of truth and justice.

By all appearances, the Friedmans of Great Neck, an affluent community in Long Island, N.Y., were a tight-knit Jewish family.

Arnold was an esteemed teacher and his wife, Elaine, was a model homemaker. Their grown children, David, Jesse and Seth, seemed normal and well-adjusted.

In 1987, the facade was abruptly shattered when police burst into their tree-shaded home and seized incriminating possessions, then arrested Arnold and Jesse and led them away in handcuffs through a maze of reporters and cameras.

What had they done to deserve this ignominy?

Arnold and Jesse, the youngest son, were charged with sexual crimes so horrible that Arnold's brother, Howard, blurted out in shock: "I sat there in disbelief. Is this my brother? My brother? This isn't my brother, he's not a monster, he's a good loving brother and husband and son and citizen and teacher. This isn't happening. This is a mistake."

But according to Frances Galasso, the police sergeant in charge of the case, there was not any doubt about Arnold's guilt.

Nevertheless, she proceeded with the utmost care. As she put it: "You always want to be very careful about how you proceed because the one thing that you worry about, I know I worried about it all the time, is just charging somebody with this kind of a crime is enough to ruin their lives."

In presenting the facts, Capturing the Friedmans is just as cautious. The documentary, which won the Grand Jury Prize at this year's Sundance Film Festival, unfolds through interviews with a wide assortment of personalities, file footage of the crime scene and Friedman home movies (one of which portrays a Passover seder).

This is a film about a quiet, responsible school teacher who hid his dark secrets behind a piano; a housewife who never really knew or understood her husband; and the relationship they had with their conflicted sons.

It is also about the depths to which dysfunctional families can sink, as well as about figurative skeletons rattling in the closet and a police investigation that was supposedly short on actual physical evidence but long on damning testimonies.

In short, this is a sensitive, multi-layered film about an unusual family whose universe was torn asunder, with tragic results.

Brain injury recovery evokes Crooked Smile

By LINDSAY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

Statistics on brain injuries and predictions for recovery are not black and white.

That's what Lainie Cohen discovered when her eldest son, Daniel, now 27, suffered a severe brain injury in a car accident in late August 1993.

Doctors did not think Daniel would ever walk or talk again, but he has regained most of his cognitive thinking and motor skills. Crooked Smile: One Family's Journey Toward Healing (ECW Press) is a first-person account that charts the first 16 months of Daniel's recovery and how his injury affected his family. (All of the author's proceeds will go to the Bloorview MacMillan Children's Foundation.)

"We couldn't imagine then how we would cope with this trauma, yet somehow we did. Helped by the love and support of family and friends, we waited and watched, hoped and prayed," writes Cohen.

Cohen has more than 25 years experience as an educator and a psychological consultant. Although this is her first book, she has edited and co-authored educational material on brain injury and is a public speaker on the subject. She has also been published in Parchment, The Globe and Mail and The Canadian Jewish News.

The book is divided into three sections: part one details a time of hope and despair, as the Cohens grapple with the dismal predictions doctors made about Daniel's future.

In part two, when Daniel is transferred from Sunnybrook Hospital to the Bloorview Macmillan Centre, Cohen and her husband, Joel find innovative ways to include rehabilitation in Daniel's life.

Part three provides closure, when Cohen faces Daniel's friend John, the driver of the car he and Daniel were thrown from, in court.

Crooked Smile closes with a satisfying epilogue, where Cohen counts her blessings and outlines some of Daniel's achievements over the past 10 years, from relearning how to walk and ski to graduating from high school.

Initially, Cohen intended to document the first year of Daniel's injury for him, since he spent a month in a coma and suffered memory loss.

But she soon discovered she was telling her story—a mother's story—and in turn, the story of her family, which also includes her two other children, Daniel's older sister Alyssa and his younger brother Jonathan. (Indeed, within months of Daniel's injury, Jonathan became involved with drugs and Alyssa suffered a physical collapse that put her in a wheelchair.)

Crooked Smile is so raw with emotion that Cohen makes the reader feel as though he or she is reliving the tragedy. She creates this feeling by including newsletters she wrote to friends and family outlining Daniel's progress, by turning family members into well-developed characters, and by baring her heart and soul, as any good writer must have the courage to do.

Cohen's writing style is descriptive and metaphorical. For instance, the title Crooked Smile refers to the first time Daniel smiled after the accident – he could show pleasure, which was positive, but the crookedness was one of the visible signs of his injury.

Cohen also shares a scene that displays the discomfort some people feel around those who suffer from brain injury: two girls Daniel went to school with made a beeline for the door when they saw him at a corner store.

In Crooked Smile, Cohen has done something very commendable: she has given a face and a name to brain injury. The book makes you look at life from a new perspective. It makes you challenge stereotypes and statistics, as well as your own self-imposed limitations, as Daniel and his family did.

She succeeds in showing how Daniel is living proof that determination and support from friends and family can turn a negative into a positive.

"He constantly surprises us," Cohen says, when explaining how nine years after his injury, Daniel relearned how to drive.

Likewise, she says no one expected her to publish what was at first just notes from her journal and a collection of her newsletters. It looks as though surprising others is a Cohen family trait.

Ribbons raise breast cancer awareness

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sandra and Lionel Waldman would like to see the world covered in pink ribbons.

As owners of Labelad/Sandylion Sticker Designs, the Waldmans have created sheets of pink ribbon stickers that they have donated to the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation (CBCF). The pink ribbon is the official mark of the foundation.

The stickers, along with a letter from Sandra Waldman, have been sent out to more than 300,000 people to help raise awareness and funds for breast cancer. To date, the project has raised more than $470,000.

Sandra initiated the campaign in honour of her late mother Sara Salter, who was a breast cancer survivor. Sandra would like women to put the pink ribbons everywhere, "on your calendar as a reminder to do a monthly breast self examination, on book covers, in cookbooks, or on envelopes when sending a letter. "Every time you see or use a sticker, I hope you will think of a woman you love who has this disease… If everyone used a sticker to represent a woman who has been touched by breast cancer, the country would be covered with pink ribbons," she wrote in the letter.

It is essential to raise breast cancer awareness, said Rochelle Kahn, CBCF national marketing and communications manager. "There are still ethnic communities in which people do not talk about [the disease]. As we do not have a cure yet, early detection is our most important ally," she said.

Stickers are a great tool because "they're accessible. You peel them off and stick them on. The logo is pretty, and pink reminds people of breast cancer. It's a no-brainer." Carol Seidman, CEO of the CBCF, said that as far as breast cancer is concerned, "although more women are becoming aware, many are still in the dark. Education must be a focus."

In the last 20 years, she said, mortality from breast cancer has dropped 20 per cent, because women are starting to take charge of their health.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Z is for Zacharin, and his CD gets an A

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Noah Zacharin's work can't be easily categorized, which makes each album of his a unique treat. His newest album, Big Daddy Z, his sixth, is a mixture of folk-rock and blues.

But Zacharin is no stranger to odd combinations. What makes this musician stand out is that he works on his chops in more than one way - he supports his musical aspirations as a part-time dentist.

He's a professional with his instruments: by day he peers into people's mouths, but by night songs come out of his own.

About a year after his last album, Crow Dark Wind, Zacharin's musical instincts told him it was time for a new album. Having written a batch of new songs, performed them, and recorded the gig, he wanted to, "make a reasonably elegant home" for the tunes.

That home is host to a smooth line-up of gratifying performances, exemplifying Zacharin's always-evolving folk style. The disc intersperses original work with cover tunes, but the disparate styles still maintain contextual consistency from song to song.

He's been listening to his musician's intuition for over three decades, since he picked up his first guitar at age nine, wrote his first song at 15, and began performing his own material at 17.

At 12, he was already beginning to improvise and explore, leaving his music teacher to learn to play guitar by ear.

Noah Zacharin

"Sometimes sloppy is best, and you have to reach for notes you are not certain are waiting for you in the dark, but you gotta reach anyway," says Zacharin.

Indeed, the sometimes sloppy, unpolished live element of Big Daddy Z evinces the natural and raw Noah Zacharin - melodies just as easy to listen to in a club, as in your own living room.

Whipping Post, a Gregg Allman cover, is filled with frisky acoustic guitar strumming and infectious riffs, blended with the kind of contemplative lovesick verses you'd hear on the car radio while cruising an open rural highway.

Topping off the recording is High Lonesome Sound, a hummable folksy finger-popping ditty, reminiscent of pop singer John Cougar Mellencamp's work from the 80s.

Honing his lyrical chops in the Montreal poetry scene before moving to Toronto in 1987, Zacharin has published hundreds of poems, reviews, and translations internationally. He was also very active in the poetry scene while still living in Montreal, doing public readings frequently, and publishing poems, translations and reviews all over the world.

That's why his music can be appreciated on so many levels. Melodically, Zacharin paints a spectrum on his palette, and lyrically, the rich detail is there to brighten the canvas.

Orthodox boxer won't fight on Shabbat

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Havah Nagilah was in the air as Dmitriy Salita marched to the ring in Puerto Rico on a Saturday night in late June, well past sundown.

For Salita, the featured fighter in the opening bout of Latin Fury, a card in which he was the only English-speaking fighter, it was time to get to the task at hand.

The 21-year-old junior welterweight (13-0, 9 KO's) made short work of journeyman John Hoffman, scoring a third round TKO and maintaining the unblemished record he's sported since the 2000 U.S. National Under-19 Championships.

Coincidentally, that was the time Salita made the decision to stop boxing on Shabbat. Prior to the championships, when he learned one of his matches conflicted with the Sabbath, the Orthodox Jewish fighter went to his rabbi for a blessing.

The rabbi, a member of the Chabad Lubavitch movement, told Salita he would be successful in anything he does, but that he shouldn't fight on Shabbat.

Salita was able to get the bout rescheduled and he went on to win the tournament. He declined to fight in the World Championship later that year because it conflicted with Shabbat.

"I definitely think it helped me and there probably is a connection [in not losing since that time]," said Salita, whose contract with renowned boxing promoter Bob Arum's Las Vegas-based Top Rank agency stipulates that he doesn't fight on any of the 70 Jewish holy days in the year (Shabbat included). "That's one of the things required of me as a Jew, to sanctify the Sabbath."

His Web site (www.dsalita.com) puts it a little differently: "If anyone want a whupping from me, they got to wait until after sundown."

Salita sees many similarities between the sweet science and Judaism, including the need for focus, dedication and self-sacrifice.

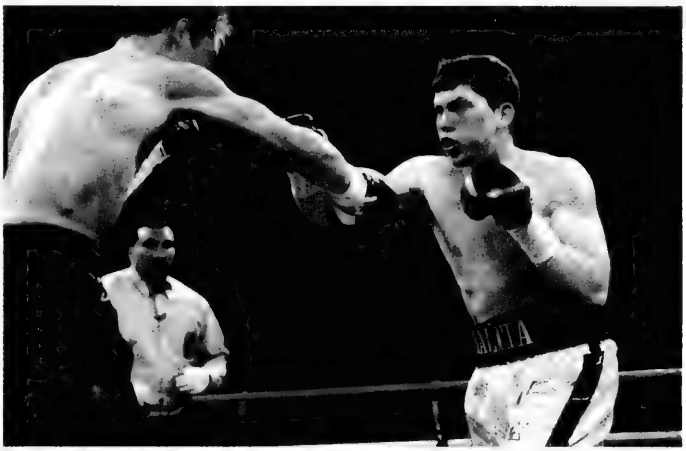
Diet is important and Salita watches what he eats – as a Jew, to make sure it's kosher, and as a boxer, to give his body energy and to make a certain weight.

His typical day starts with morning prayers, usually around 6 a.m. Afterward, he goes for a run, has breakfast and heads for the gym. After he rests up, he's back at the gym for more work, and, if the requests are there, he takes time for a few media interviews.

Salita was born in the Black Sea port of Odessa and moved with his family to Brooklyn when he was nine. Growing up in Ukraine, Salita always wanted to be a champion athlete, at first in karate. But a few years after coming to America, he visited New York's Starrett City Boxing Club, run by his current trainer Jimmy O'Pharrow, and immediately he was hooked.

He didn't fail to impress O'Pharrow: "My gym's like a league of nations," O'Pharrow said. "I seen every kind of kid come through the doors, but I ain't never seen one like this Dmitriy. The kid looks Russian, prays Jewish and fights Black."

In his early days in New York, Salita was picked on by his classmates. When he first started going to school, he was dressed in the same clothes he wore in Ukraine. His classmates made fun of him because of his wardrobe and because he didn't speak English. While he didn't take up boxing to protect himself on the street, he said it sure helped make the teasing go away in a hurry.



Dmitriy Salita (right) has signed a contract stipulating he won't fight on any of 70 Jewish holy days during the year, including Shabbat.

Being different is nothing new for Salita, who has been the only white, Jewish boxer in his gym since he took up the sport eight years ago.

"I consider it an art," he said. "That's how I create my magic when I'm in the ring. A painter uses canvas, I use the ring canvas. I think great fighters are great artists. Boxing is much more than it appears to the average eye or person who doesn't know what's involved in it."

Salita, who had a 59-5 record as an amateur and was the 2001 New York Golden Gloves 139-pound champion, is a sharp, accurate puncher with good hand speed. He throws a variety of effective punches and mixes combinations to the head and body.

His mother, Lyudmila, was originally opposed to Dmitriy's boxing, but she eventually became an enthusiastic supporter. It wasn't until she was being treated for breast cancer in 1998 at a New York hospital that he truly discovered Judaism.

Before she died in January 1999, Lyudmila shared a hospital room with a Jewish woman who persuaded her son to look into Judaism.

After her death, Dmitriy began going to synagogue each day to say Kaddish and he studied with Zalman Liberow, a Chabad rabbi. Rabbi Liberow's brother, Israel, was Salita's initial connection to Arum. Israel, who also has smichah, is Salita's advisor on everything concerning the interaction between boxing and Judaism.

"I believe God guides people in certain directions for certain reasons and I really believe in Divine Providence," Salita said. "Whatever happened to me, happened to me for a reason. I'm just doing what I love."

In the ring, the 5-9, 144-pound Salita wears a Star of David on his trunks with his initials in it, just like Jewish fighters did early in the last century to give themselves motivation and inspiration.

He's striving to become the first Jewish champion since Mike Rossman, who briefly held the light heavyweight title in 1976-77.

"He's very good and he's improving all the time," said Arum, a Boxing Hall of Fame promoter who comes from an Orthodox Jewish background and who is a big supporter of Chabad. "He's probably 18 months away from a title shot."

By MIRIAM PORTER

A journey in progress

Hi, I'm Miriam Porter. I am a Jewish independent woman with strong morals and beliefs. I don't believe in compromising my integrity where careers, relationships or religion are concerned. I am now in my 30s, and as I journey down this path, I look forward to sharing what my peers and I have learned so far.

I won't pretend to have all the answers in this column, but I do promise to raise a lot of questions. I have the knowledge of my 20s behind me and the unknown future of my 40s in front of me.

As a 30-something female, I am faced with various societal pressures and cultural expectations. When confronting them, it's important to keep things in perspective and do what you feel is right, regardless of whether you are Reform, Conservative or Orthodox.

I grew up in a Conservative home in North York. I remember when I was younger being told by adults that by my 30s, I was supposed to "have it all figured out." I innocently believed them. But now when someone says this to me, I laugh (sometimes to myself, sometimes out loud, and sometimes just to cover up a nervous cough).

I happily accept where I am in my life today, and I try not to compare myself to others. As the famous saying goes, the grass is always greener, or more beautiful, or luckier, or happier, on the other side. (Or so we foolishly think.)

The truth is, we can't look at what other people have and judge whether it's better, easier or more satisfying. I learned this lesson gradually during four years living and working in Los Angeles as an actor, and later producing my own television series here in Canada.

My personal experiences have taught me to have faith and believe that things usually happen for reasons, whether we know what they are at the time or come to understand them years later. I have used this faith and applied it to my personal and professional life.

It is through faith and the guidance of friends and rabbis that I have found a deeper connection to Judaism. This connection has affected many things in my life, especially how I feel about dating, marriage, kids, family, careers, Israel, friends, spirituality and love. I will be covering these topics in future columns. I welcome your comments at miriam@jtvproductions.net.

Thanks to the participation by RBC Financial Group and VISA Canada, Official sponsors of the Canadian Olympic Committee, the Krinos Taste of the Danforth will transform Danforth Avenue east of Pape into an interactive sporting area with families able to try their hand at various summer games, sports, and appearances by Canadian Olympic athletes. Drop by the Toronto East General Hospital tent and purchase a lottery ticket to win a Honda Civic compliments of Toronto Honda or a trip to Greece compliments of World of Vacations and Air Transat.

"Toronto's GreekTown is perhaps more supportive of the Olympic Games than any other community in Canada, given our heritage," says GreekTown BIA Chair Sue Zindros. "We're thrilled to help Athens celebrate the forthcoming summer games, and tip our toque to Vancouver-Whistler for their successful 2010 Winter Games bid. We look forward to helping Canada's athletes compete at both sets of games."

"We're proud to have sponsored the Krinos Taste of the Danforth for 10 successful years," says Krinos Foods General Manager Alex Alexakis. "This is truly one of Toronto's greatest jewels, and the pride of Greek communities not just here in Canada but around the globe."

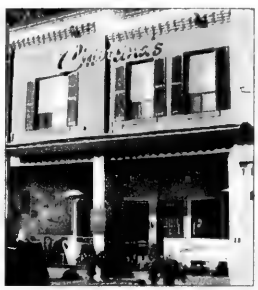
GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Christina's crown jewel of Danforth

For truly authentic, upscale Greek cuisine, live entertainment and star quality, no restaurant shines quite as brightly as the effervescent Christina's. Outside, its golden frontage sports elegant wrought-iron signage, and its year-round patio is THE spot to eat, greet, see and be seen — an epicentre of Danforth activity. Inside, earth tones, buttercup yellow and turquoise form a soothing backdrop for historical Greek etchings.



Christina's
On The Danforth
492 Danforth at Logan
www.christinas.info

Christina's is ideally suited for private functions such as Bar Mitzvah parties. Indoors, a cozy, slightly elevated dining area at rear provides intimacy; outdoors, the patio reigns supreme for open-air celebrations.

If you've been to Greece, you'll recognize the distinctive differences in Christina's menu. In addition to wonderful mainstream Greek fare, you'll find specialties such as Kolokithokeftedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, gently pan-fried to golden crispness, an exquisite complement to any meal. THIS is GreekTown at its finest. The assorted dip platters (Pikilia Mezedakia, cold; Christina's Pikilia, hot & cold) are both teeming and delicious. The Seafood Souvlaki features large, marinated chunks of calamari, shrimps and scallops, grilled to perfection. The Greek Island Seafood Soup is heartwarmingly flavourful.

Fresh fish and seafood lovers will be thrilled with the whole grilled red snapper and fresh whole sea bass. There's even a seafood souvlaki! Traditional items also prove gratifying. The leg of lamb, succulently stuffed with spinach, sautéed onion, pepper and fresh herbs, is noteworthy, as is the moussaka, both traditional and vegetarian.

Live entertainment on weekends includes belly dancing and a two-piece (bouzouki and guitar) Greek band playing a blend of old and modern Greek tunes. There's nothing like a rendering of Never On Sunday or Zorba The Greek to tug at your heartstrings and whet your Greek appetite. On Wednesday nights there's live jazz, and, as part of an ongoing tradition, Christina's is open late daily to accommodate the theatre and entertainment crowd.

Christina's also does a brisk business catering to special events. Enjoyed in or out, the GreekTown experience doesn't come any better.

Sharing the taste of Greece at Mezes

Sharing the taste of Greece with its customers, and accordingly celebrating family and culture, is the definition of Mezes' appeal. Consistency, quality, and freshness have been the anchors of its success.

For years Mezes has been enticing patrons to choose from a markedly extensive menu of its namesake: small, appetizer-sized portions of deliciousness meant to be ordered in multitudes and collectively enjoyed by the table. In fact, this communal style of dining, which is as authentically Greek as the gastronomy, serves to uniquely heighten the experience at Mezes.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food, and it encourages people to try new things."

Mezes
AUTHENTIC GREEK CUISINE
456 DANFORTH AVENUE

WWW.MEZES.CA

Hungry diners, in Sue's experience, tend to order familiar things, or "comfort food". Mezes encourages diners to blend the familiar with the new. The fact that everything at Mezes is made fresh from scratch, with the finest natural ingredients, is added incentive to experiment.

Seafood abounds on the Mezes bill of fare. Certainly try the tender grilled octopus, or the shrimp prepared one of three ways: broiled and crusted with garlic; surrounded by fresh vegetables and splashed with lemon; or baked with feta in a tomato sauce. The fish, broiled whole and drizzled with the best olive oil, is embellished only by the promotion of its own natural flavour. Dolmades — grape vine leaves embracing a delicate mixture of rice, ground beef, and dill — remain one of the most popular selections. The tender lamb chops, ordered by the piece or as an entrée, have inspired quite a following of their own. Vegetarians will delight in a vast number of menu items, among them the Gigantes — lima beans slow cooked with garden vegetables and fresh herbs in a tomato base.

For the summer, Mezes has a covered, luxuriously curtained, waterproof pavilion that extends the warm, candlelit setting of the indoors right out into the street. The attention to detail at Mezes — from the service to the cookery to the creation of memories — is truly what makes every day, and every meal, a celebration.

Going home . . . to Kalyvia

In a culinary reverse twist of sorts, dining out at Kalyvia means going home.

Mike and Peter Tsafatinos, who hail from the Greek town of Kalyvia, a few miles from Sparta, have seen their efforts rewarded by an unerring reputation for authentic, "homemade" Greek cuisine at the Danforth's most approachable prices. This is no small achievement, considering that literally everything on the menu — including the appetizers and dips — is prepared from scratch fresh daily.

KALYVIA
420 DANFORTH AVE.
WWW.KALYVIA.COM

Kalyvia's lofty standards for quality and freshness have earned it a four-star rating from Toronto by Night Journal, and a loyal clientele that has ushered Kalyvia into its second decade of success.

Under the watchful eyes of the Tsafatinos' sons Jim and Jim, and a host of other family members, each and every dish emerges from the kitchen brimming with homemade taste. As befits a "homemade" meal, portions are gargantuan — worthy of any doting mother. The combination platters of seafood and meat, priced from $26.95, offer a staggering variety of Greek specialties, yet each item is prepared with individual attention and care. The appetizers and dips are particularly zesty. Appetizers include the wonderfully decadent Mushrooms à la Kalyvia ($4.95) — sautéed in spices and brandy. Any three dips can be ordered for only $9.50; try the Melitzanosalata (eggplant), Skordalia (potato), and Taramosalata (red caviar). If you're partial to Spanakopitakia (spinach pies), you'll be able to taste the Kalyvia difference.

The peach-toned walls are adorned by Greek murals and original art. The ceramic-tiled dining room fronts a smaller, more intimate elevated dining area at rear with strip oak flooring. But it's on the inviting patio where the fun really starts; consider it your "front porch".

A family atmosphere prevails, with a general air of congeniality and an abundance of kids' selections on the menu.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Kalyvia is one of a very few places in Toronto where you can still enjoy the tastes and trappings of home in a family restaurant environment. It has "Mom" written all over it.

Every meal a special occasion at The Palace

At The Palace, every meal is a special occasion. From the moment you enter, you're treated like royalty.

The Palace's menu reveals a selection of royal fare unmatched on the Danforth. The appetizers alone provide more choice than some entire menus, and they stand alone in terms of freshness, preparation and authenticity.

THE PALACE RESTAURANT
722 Pape Avenue at Danforth
416-462-1166
VISIT US DURING THE TASTE OF THE DANFORTH AUG. 8-10

Among the hot appetizers, the Hot Mezze Platter (Kalamari, Grilled Octopus, Loukaniko, and Bifteki) is a meal in itself; among the cold, try the Cold Mezze Platter (Tzatziki, Taramosalata, Melitzanosalata, Kalamata Olives and pickled beets with pita).

If you can ever tear yourself away from the appetizers, the Avgolemono soup, a chicken & rice broth finished with gently whipped egg & lemon juice, is delicately prepared, the Greek salad crisp and lavishly portioned.

Rack of lamb and moussaka are two prized specialties of the house; you'll be hard-pressed to find their equal. The Lamb Kleftiko also deserves special mention; the combination of lamb, feta cheese, sweet bell peppers, onions and mushrooms is simply divine inside its phyllo pastry envelope.

The Palace is also highly reputed for its fresh fish; try the Grilled Swordfish Steak with lemon and herbs, the Whole Broiled Sea Bass, or the Atlantic Salmon Steak. Whatever your preference, you'll find it here, prepared to the absolute maximum of its flavour.

As befits a Palace, there's a private Party room for up to 100 people. Located on the upper level, it's ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

The management and staff go to great lengths to ensure your comfort and satisfaction. A visit to this culinary kingdom is pure pleasure; nobody does Greek like The Palace.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Myth, or reality? You decide.

So many superlatives, from so many sources. Is Myth too good to be true?

Thankfully, the qualities that drew an outpouring of rave reviews on Myth's opening in 1994 are still in evidence today. For example:

- "The most distinctive new restaurant on Toronto's Danforth strip" (Adele Weder);
- "Myth sets a new standard on the Danforth by which everything else will be measured" (Sara Waxman);
- "...heaven for vegetarians, both in terms of choice and finesse ... fragrance and flavour to die for." (Vitality)

myth

417 Danforth Ave.
www.myth.to

Today's Myth is actually a restored theatre with theatrical mystique intact, complete with a loft-style mezzanine that hosts some of Toronto's most upscale private parties. Architecturally, it's a glorious fusion of Greek, Far Eastern and Italian motifs, outrageously hurled together in a rich palette of gold, black, copper, maroon, and pewter. Improbable on paper, it works spectacularly well in person. With palatially high ceilings and enthralling sightlines, Myth is fronted by gigantic, articulated glass garage doors that unfurl to accommodate the Danforth's most lively patio.

Myth has achieved ultrahip status while maintaining a firm grip on the warm hospitality and consistently high quality that are the underpinnings of any fine restaurant.

Executive Chef Ken Brudner's menu is Mediterranean, but like the decor, it melds influences from further afield. One example: the Grilled Moroccan Half Chicken with braised eggplant, dried fruit & nut ragout and herbed couscous. Eclectic vegetarian offerings include Imam Biyaldi (currants, pine nuts & saffron pilaf stuffed in purple eggplant with melted onions & tomato). Among the pastas, try the Rabbit Stifado Mantia: oven-baked pasta purses with aromatic spices, mavrodaphne jus & pearl onions. For more mainstream tastes, the grilled Black Angus Striploin Steak is absolutely scintillating.

Bar Mitzvah parties

Its size and cutting-edge chic have made Myth a prime destination for Bar Mitzvah parties and other catered private events. If you haven't yet had the pleasure of this Myth-ological dining experience, one visit will corroborate everything you've heard and read about it. That's Myth — and reality.

Fair trade crafts at Ten Thousand Villages

Can you really represent handicrafts of 10,000 different origins in a small, unassuming shop? Ten Thousand Villages makes a valiant and visually compelling attempt.

Featuring some of the most intriguing hand-crafted items imaginable — from a myriad of geographic destinations — this fascinating concept store carries objets d'art fashioned according to the fair trade credo: fair prices paid promptly to artisans who work in humane conditions. That means neither child labour nor exploitation of any kind.

In fact, Ten Thousand Villages pays an advance of up to 50% for crafts to provide artisans with operating capital.

The word "unique" has become overworked, but it really does apply here; each item is one of a kind. Striking, dishwasher-safe ceramics; an incredible variety of handwoven baskets; magnificent silk scarves; jewellery; candle holders; mobiles and other handmade toys; chess sets; scented soaps; even musical instruments, including conga drums prized by musicians city-wide. If it's hand-made and has a unique cachet, chances are Ten Thousand Villages has it. From the practical to the whimsical, from the inexpensive to the extravagant, there's a gift here with your name — or a lucky recipient's — on it.

In-store videos are available to explain how many of the items were created. Steeping yourself in a piece's history — and knowing that by purchasing it you're nurturing the artist who created it — makes the Ten Thousand Villages experience doubly gratifying.

This being the Danforth, even your taste buds are catered to, with some heavenly fair-trade Columbian coffee. The beans are fresh roasted when ordered by each store.

A non-profit corporation staffed mainly by volunteers, Ten Thousand Villages has seen its popularity soar to the tune of 180 stores across North America. The recent opening of its GreekTown location is a natural fit for the ever-expanding Danforth cultural mosaic, and further evidence of the growing popularity of the Fair Trade movement. If you have a strong sense of esthetics — and value fair play — you'll be right at home here.

Messini Authentic Gyros a GreekTown hit

Just when you think you've tasted it all in GreekTown, along comes a new culinary sensation to reset your dining parameters. Long known for Toronto's finest souvlaki, moussaka and other Greek specialties, the Danforth now welcomes Messini Authentic Gyros to its cavalcade of fine restaurants.

Recognized for its beautiful beaches, the city of Messini, in the southeast corner of Peloponessos, is also known for its excellent southern Greek cuisine. Following some 20 years of experience in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas has opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece.

MESSINI AUTHENTIC GYROS

416-778-4861

Roasted slowly to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process, during which a consistent temperature must be maintained. Prepared fresh from scratch — no freezing, no precooking — Messini's version will make your palate sing.

Once your gyros is ordered, the meat is carefully sliced and served in a soft, fluffy pita with tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (ironically, the traditionally Greek style).

Messini has further innovated by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros, allowing it to cater to a broader range of dietary preferences and palates.

According to Dafnas, each component of the gyros, including the pita it's served in, is designed to maximize the taste and enhance the flavour of the overall product. The result: a sandwich that absolutely melts in your mouth with a rich blend of flavours, the subtleties of which seem to become more distinct with each bite.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $8.95, lunch specials from $5.95. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Soothing brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

With a menu that's easy on the pocketbook and delightful to the palate, Sushi Delight is always busy, and their lunch special is the best value you'll find anywhere.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Dramatic differences are the rule at Pan

Innovation. Creativity. Flair. Poignancy. All of these words apply in equal measure to Pan, where Greek / Mediterranean cuisine takes on a delightfully proprietary dimension.

PAN ON THE DANFORTH
516 Danforth Avenue
Visit us at panonthedanforth.com

Cited as "one of the city's best" Greek restaurants by Toronto Life magazine, Pan keeps its customers coming back by delivering consistently superb quality across an ever-evolving array of dishes that are deliciously different — sometimes subtly, often dramatically — from any other versions out there.

Pan's updated menu is a case in point. While retaining signature dishes like the Char-Grilled Loin of Lamb with fig and orange glaze and the Santorini chicken due to ongoing demand, it features a number of new, absolute must-try offerings. The Pan Seared Grouper is delicacy incarnate, with its thin strip of salmon, in a white wine cream reduction wrapped around asparagus and served with new mini potatoes and cherry tomatoes.

Topping the heartiness scale, without sacrificing refinement, is a Black Angus New York striploin served with garlic mash and grilled portobello mushrooms, finished with Madagascar peppercorns in a brandy-beef reduction sauce. And just when you think you've tasted the be-all and the end-all in seafood pasta, Pan raises the bar another notch with its Linguini with shrimp, calamari, mussels and sea bass in a heavenly basil tomato sauce.

The dips — one standard by which all Greek restaurants can be measured and compared — still lead the Danforth parade in flavour and presentation.

Meeting elevated expectations isn't just a responsibility, it's fun, says owner Peter Kyriacou. "Our customers expect each meal to be better than the last; we wouldn't have it any other way." Peter, wife Maria and daughter Stella are a welcoming presence. Though Pan caters to an international clientele liberally sprinkled with movie stars and other show business personalities, this is one celebrity restaurant that always treats each customer with the same warmth and personal attention.

Recently renovated, Pan now sports a shiny new hardwood floor and a brighter, uptempo colour scheme, though the feel is still warm and artsy-vibrant. The stage is always set for a gala performance, and night in, night out, Pan rewards with an elevating dining experience.

THE COOK'S PLACE

Big Carrot's commitment to organics & service repaid by customer loyalty

How do you remain the leader in an increasingly crowded field? By stocking your shelves with products that are as good for the environment as they are for your customers, and by providing a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. From humble beginnings in 1983, The Big Carrot has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living.

Organic, GMO-free, Kosher products

Run as a worker owned co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

Anchoring the Carrot Common Mall with a laid-back, homespun atmosphere that its customers value as much as the products themselves, The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market, a wholistic dispensary, and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

While most health food stores carry a few brands of a particular item, The Big Carrot often has half a dozen or more, and its well-versed staff is more than happy to help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher — or a combination thereof. The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; tomato products from Utopia, also Ontario-grown; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Neil's Prepared Soups; Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Cold Mountain Miso; Jersey Farm Non-Dairy Soy Yogurt; cookies from Organica; Soy Delicious Non-Dairy Frozen Desserts; selected products from Eden Foods; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods. For babies and toddlers, Stonyfield Farm YoBaby Yogurt, in 6 x 4 oz. packs, is both organic and Kosher.

The Big Carrot carries a tremendous variety of healthy desserts and sweets. Tropical Source Kosher chocolate bars, made in Israel, are available in several delicious flavours. Try the Toasted Almond! Country Choice Sandwich Creme Cookies and Ginger Snaps, Pavich Farms packaged dates, raisins and pitted prunes, and Cocoa Camino Fair Trade Cocoa mixes are both organic and Kosher.

Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups are popular mainstays, as are Bob's Red Mill packaged grains, cereals and baking goods; the Big Carrot stocks both in abundance.

The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold. From the Organic Lentil Daal to the Organic Couscous Salad, every item is a taste and visual treat. It also offers a selection of sinfully delicious desserts without the sin, since they're free of refined ingredients.

The Big Carrot's Wholistic Dispensary, located across the courtyard, constitutes a store in its own right. Among other Kosher products, it carries Omega Flax Seed Oil and selected Solgar Supplements.

Of Toronto's growing number of juice bars, The Big Carrot's is the only one that's 100% organic, giving you, in a quick pit stop, the optimum high-octane fuel. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats. Popular blender drinks include Zen Berry (banana, blueberries, orange, vitamin C crystals, bee pollen, flaxseed oil, and protein powder) and the Energy Elevator (carrot, spinach, raspberry, Ginseng). This isn't just juice, it's a meal replacement.

Toronto's only 100% organic juice bar

Among the sandwiches, try the Grilled Tempeh, lettuce, tomato, red onion & honey mustard mayo. Fresh, delicious and wholesome — just as Nature intended.

For a summer treat, enjoy Mapleton's organic ice cream, as well as Cool Hemp, a Kosher, organic non-dairy dessert available in a cup or wholesome organic waffle cone.

Through its continuing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. If you want the word "stress" to disappear from your vocabulary — at least temporarily — shop here.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Kristian: high style, personal service

A wealth of hairstyling expertise, prestigious industry awards and a down-to-earth approach add up to Kristian Haute Coiffure on the Danforth.

Nestled comfortably among the boutiques and shops west of the Carrot Common, Kristian offers a relaxed environment for personal beautification. From the elliptical signage to the peaches-and-cream decor, an air of softness and gentleness prevails.

The mother-and-son team of Mary and Kristian Petrou have a combined 50 years of experience in cutting, styling, and colouring. Now in their tenth year at 236 Danforth Avenue, they cater to a loyal and discerning clientele wanting to look and feel their very best.

Kristian's avant-garde approach to hairstyling has garnered three prestigious International Beauty Show awards, while Mary has been a finalist for the l'Oreal Colour Trophy. Over and above the awards, however, the biggest testimony to the salon's success is that it's always busy.

Between scheduled appointments and walk-in trade, the activity level is always high; a reputation for downtown styling at uptown prices — and an easygoing attitude — will do that for you.

Weddings and other special occasions comprise a large part of Kristian's business. Brides-to-be usually book their appointment six months in advance, with a trial styling scheduled two months prior to the wedding to "dress rehearse" the look you envision.

Kristian is a full-service salon, offering esthetics, facials, manicures, pedicures, waxing, and sculpted acrylic nails, all rendered with the same commitment to excellence. Only the finest hair and beauty products are used, including L'Oreal Professional, all-natural Biolage by Matrix, Rusk, and Curly Hair Solutions.

The Danforth is all about style, and your hairstyle is the focal point of your personal appearance. At Kristian Haute Coiffure, your treasured locks, curls and tresses are in the best of hands.

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

Pantheon's popularity continues to soar

Of all the restaurants in GreekTown, Pantheon's decor is perhaps the most inviting. The creamy white tile floor etched with gold is soothing, yet refined; the walls, alive with colourful murals, are capped with finely etched wooden trim; the tables, bedecked with crisp linens in white and gold, are flanked by real wooden chairs.

Last summer, Pantheon doubled in size while retaining its charm, intimacy and — most important — its culinary excellence. The "west wing", with rust-coloured tile and working fireplace, gave Pantheon's growing clientele much more of it to love.

Though its mainstream Greek cuisine compares favourably with that of other Danforth restaurants, fresh fish is what keeps Pantheon's loyal following coming back in droves. Whole sea bass, striped bass, red and white snapper, orange roughy, black porgy, salmon, red mullet, sea smelts — the variety is incredible, the preparation impeccable. As one major daily noted, "Above all, small fish imported from Greece, such as anchovies and baby sardines . . . demand repeat visits. [This lovely fish] is what sets Pantheon apart from most Toronto Greek restaurants."

"... a winning charm ..."

"... fresh fish, care with good products and little razzmatazz nudges Pantheon ahead of most competitors ..."

Chef Nick Paroussis — who, with partner John Troupis, is responsible for maintaining these lofty standards — clearly understands the need for delicacy and refinement when preparing fresh fish. Likewise for the fresh Ontario lamb chops, which can be enjoyed on their own or as part of a substantial mixed grill.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts provide a fitting conclusion to your meal. In addition to the traditional baklava, you'll find Pantheon's walnut cake particularly enticing, and its honey cake will no doubt give rise to endless comparisons with you-know-who's.

You'd expect to pay a premium for such superb cuisine, but Pantheon's prices are actually below average for the Danforth. When you combine this with the aforementioned ambience, you're talking exceptional value for GreekTown.

Exotic delights at Sher-E-Punjab

The soulful strains of the sitar greet you as you enter. The deep, rich earth tones of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — are at once exotic and peaceful. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajastan, adorn the butternut-yellow walls.

You're not even seated yet, and already you've begun to experience the tranquility that is Sher-E-Punjab.

SHER-E-PUNJAB RESTAURANT
351 Danforth Avenue
416-465-2125

For Amar and Malkit Singh, this is more than a restaurant; it's the place where they've lovingly served Northern Indian home cooking for the past 29 years. In the process, they've not only shared wonderful flavours, but also touched everyone who'se visited with their gentle demeanor and quiet dignity.

Connoisseurs of Punjabi specialities have known about Sher-E for decades, but with its major renovation eight years ago and the growing popularity of Northern Indian cuisine, a much larger dining public has come to know and savour its diverse delights.

Widely reputed for its Butter Chicken, Chicken Tikka Masala, Pakoras and Samosas, Sher-E holds the distinction of making Toronto's finest Naan bread — a soft, oval loaf that's best served hot. But be forewarned: it's addictive! Hand-made on the premises, it is baked fresh virtually on demand — every 15 minutes or so, at busy times — and delivered piping hot to your table. The experience of seeing it emerge from the massive Tandoori clay oven is surpassed only by the pleasure of eating it.

This, truly, is manna from heaven.

Saag — a pureed mixture of spinach, broccoli, and rapini — is another dish prized by Sher-E's customers for its unique combination of sharp and mellow tastes. The ever-popular Daal (pureed lentils) and Bartha — barbequed eggplant with green peas — are also first-rate.

If you can put down the Naan bread long enough to order dessert, try the refreshing Kulfi (Indian ice cream). Indian Tea – strong, sweet, and mildly spiced — is a piquant complement to any meal or dessert.

Those unfamiliar with Northern Indian cuisine tend to associate it only with curry. To be sure, you'll enjoy fine curried dishes here, made from scratch with the freshest, hand-blended spices; but this is only a very small part of the culinary picture. Sher-E-Punjab completes the tableau with elegance and grace, and with the kind of personal attention, respect and warmth that's only found in a long-established family business.

Nowhere is the multicultural appeal of the Danforth better exemplified than at Sher-E-Punjab, and those who visit it are in for a richly rewarding experience.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Iliada Kaffeteria will make you kvell

It could just as well be Paris, Athens, Budapest, or Prague. But it's Greektown Toronto, and if your caffé latté's to die for, you're probably at Iliada.

In an expansive, high-ceilinged, uncluttered space reminiscent of the great cafés of Europe, Iliada raises beverage-making to an art form.

The ambience is relaxed, the seating ultracomfortable, the service warm and thorough. This is a landing strip for the serious coffee connoisseur. If you like your atmosphere mellow and your beverages bang-on, Iliada will fit you like a glove.

The Greek influence is omnipresent, from the pleasing mix of melodies to the menu, where the "K" in Kaffeteria ubiquitously replaces the familiar "C". Thus coffee is koffee, cake is kake, and so on.

Ks aside, Peter Kazantzi and daughter Jimmi clearly know their ABCs when it comes to service and satisfaction. Whether you're here for a casual drink or a light meal, the red carpet treatment is the rule — as red as the pleasing crimson that highlights the decor.

In keeping with European tradition, all speciality beverages are made fresh from scratch with pure ingredients. That means real ice cream in the iced cappuccinos, real liqueurs in the specialty coffees, and real care and attention to detail. Snacks are fussed over as if they were complete meals. In short, this is everything a chain restaurant isn't.

Though Iliada's known best for its speciality beverages and seductive desserts, the menu also includes freshly-squeezed fruit juices (the Citrus Blast blend of orange and pink grapefruit provides welcome relief on a hot day) and a variety of salads, starters, and sandwiches. Among the latter, Pete's Gourmet Burger (with sautéed mushrooms, aged white cheddar, red onion & roasted red pepper aoli) is a house favourite. The lavish dessert menu includes crisp Belgian waffles and Iliada's special Baked Bananas with vanilla ice cream, honey and walnuts.

Open late daily, Iliada presents only one Homeric struggle: deciding which temptation to yield to first. This kaffeteria will make you kvell.

Remember the first time you saw a peacock feather, and how it thrilled you with wonder and joy? A visit to Jane Hall The Voice of Color arouses those same emotions.

In concert with Pittsburgh Paints, this renowned artist's signature style takes clients on a unique home decor adventure.

The stunning European-style showroom offers an exclusive home collection of artwork, custom painted and upholstered furniture, plus bedding, throws, cushions, area rugs, and 225 colors of paint. Each of six room vignettes evokes a different mood with inspired color combinations.

Jane Hall
707 Pape at Danforth

In fact, to call this a "showroom" is to somehow diminish it, for it has the aura and feel of a highly personal space. Hall and partner Ian Levack don't tell you how colors work, they show you. The visual feast — a glorious palette of mustard, fuschia, avocado, yellow gold, burnt orange, and other breathtaking hues — demonstrate a quasi-spiritual connection with color. The custom-painted fabric which upholsters Hall's chairs and spans her elegant wrought-iron screens is but one example.

After years of designing fabric and painting murals — including many for the Second Cup chain — Hall was moved to do her own paintings and custom furniture. Levack creates and designs home furnishing products on a licensing basis; among others, he designed the first Royal Doulton licensing program for home furnishings.

The store's dramatic room vignettes were created by Zerick Garner, the third member of the team, who has worked for 37 years in eclectic areas of the design and decor world.

Jane Hall is one of only a handful of North American retailers carrying the whimsical Solo line of upscale furniture. Created by Toronto-area craftsman Joe Salerno, these custom high-quality sofas and chairs, with their strong hues and curving lines, are a perfect complement to Hall's fearless approach to color.

You won't find any paint cans on the floor; customers order the paint, which is delivered to their homes. In-store consulting, home visits, and a contracting service are all part of the Jane Hall experience.

The buzz of excitement that's surrounded the store since its opening continues unabated. One visit explains why; your eyes will thank you.

Symphony of flavours at Diners Thai

With the recent explosion in popularity of Thai cuisine, it's no surprise that a sterling representative of this genre now resides in GreekTown.

Perhaps no other cuisine offers such a wide diversity of tastes, temperatures, nuances and subtleties. Whether chili-hot or comparatively bland, harmony is the guiding principle behind each dish. Thai cuisine is essentially a marriage of centuries-old Eastern and Western influences harmoniously combined. Culinary influences include Chinese (stir frying), Portuguese (chilies), French, and Japanese. The use of coconut oil and coconut milk, fresh herbs such as lemon grass and galaga, and aromatic spices like coriander is characteristically Thai.

The Diners Thai
395 Danforth at Chester Subway
416-466-9222
Dine In, Take Out, Delivery

Whether your tastes run to hot, sour, sweet, or any number of combinations thereof, Diners Thai satisfies them — often on the same plate.

The menu is replete with exotic gems at extremely affordable prices. Above and beyond the obligatory Pad Thai, Diners' version is exemplary — you'll find wonderful soups, salads, chicken dishes galore, and many vegetarian selections. All entrées are served with fragrant jasmine rice.

The Thai Mushroom Soup (fresh mushrooms in a spicy sour broth with lemon grass, lime juice and chili) is hot and flavourful, the Green Mango Salad (spicy green mangos marinated with ground chili, sweet sauce and peanuts) particularly zesty. Attention chicken lovers — try the Basil Chicken, redolent with fresh basil, garlic, sweet peppers and chili peppers. Also noteworthy are the Mango Chicken (stir fried with sliced mango, ginger, and garlic in sweet and sour sauce and vegetables), and the Cashew Chicken. The Garlic and Pepper Lamb — particularly apt for GreekTown — is a stirring success. Among the vegetarian dishes, the Thai style eggplant is an elegant mélange of spicy and sweet tastes.

One can never have too much harmony, either in one's life or on one's plate. Diners Thai is music to the palate.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

"Why are we so busy?"

And you thought Saul Korman had all the answers. As another sunny Danforth morning brightens his sixth decade as GreekTown's pre-eminent fashion retailer, Korman seems at a loss to explain why, in a tough economy, Korry's sales are at an all-time high.

"I'd like to think it's because we've always tried to do things the right way," he says. "You can use all the economic buzzwords you want, but when it comes right down to it, it's about people. If you treat them right, they'll keep coming back. And the customer is always right!"

Having the right product, says Korman, is only a small part of the equation. Korry's success with the Hugo Boss and Canali labels, as well as with the homegrown Arnold Brant, is well-known, but it's what he and his staff do with them that makes the difference. When you buy a suit at Korry's, you're not just buying a label; you're buying the 50 plus years of expertise that ensures you'll walk out the door with a perfectly-fitting garment that flatters your physique, complexion and personality.

Do the right things, and they will come

Korry's also takes great pains to educate their customers in the value of a garment. The price tag of a $1600 Canali suit might seem daunting, says Korman, but when you've experienced how its timeless elegance and flawless tailoring enhance your appearance and overall aura, you'll understand that it's the "finest value in the clothing industry."

The latest swing in the men's fashion pendulum has seen the re-emergence of two-button suits, with more venting, and flat-fronted and single-pleated pants. This revival of bygone elegance is further evidence that crisp, beautifully tailored garments "never go out of style. Whether you're in a social environment or a business setting, you're better off erring on the side of distinction". And, he notes, you should never underestimate the power of a compliment. "When someone tells you that you look great, it can make your day. It can literally make the difference between closing your next deal or not."

Sept. 22 golf tournament to benefit Toronto East General Hospital

"There's a reason," he continues, "why we stop and think about what to wear every morning. We care about how we look, and how we appear to other people. So if that's true, why should we feel bashful about looking our best? No one ever got a compliment for being underdressed."

At Korry's, treating people right extends far beyond the confines of 569 Danforth. Korman is actively involved in a number of charitable events, such as the Sept. 22 golf tournament he's sponsoring at Scarborough Golf and Country Club. Proceeds go to Toronto East General Hospital; Korman is a Director of the Hospital Foundation. He's also a kingpin in most GreekTown events, particularly the annual Taste Of The Danforth, which raises money on behalf of a number of charities. If Korman is enthusiastic about men's fashion, he's positively ballistic about the Taste Of The Danforth.

"We're talking about the largest street festival in North America here", he crows. "We're talking about sampling the best of a dozen different cultures, right here in GreekTown. You can't eat better and you can't eat cheaper anywhere else, anytime — and you're benefitting worthy causes to boot. What' s not to love?"

Korman's radio commercials, heard daily on a variety of local radio stations, are a natural extension of his effusive personality. He ad-libs them, live from wherever he happens to be when they air — often from his cell phone. Love him or hate him, virtually everyone who listens to radio in Toronto is all ears when his dulcet tones swathe the airwaves. They're a refreshing change from the canned commercials we all get so tired of hearing. "My radio spots are prepared fresh from scratch — just like the food in GreekTown," he winks.

"My radio commercials are prepared fresh from scratch — just like the food in Greektown"

Korman and his fellow Danforth merchants form a mutual admiration society of sorts. Many of these neighbours are lifelong friends who Korman has known from the time they immigrated from Greece. Seeing the same, familiar faces for decades has given him the largest extended family anyone could wish for, so it's not surprising that he spends so much time at 569 Danforth. "I'm always home, whether I'm here or in my "other" home."

A taste of the Danforth isn't complete without a tour of 569 Danforth Avenue. He's been called the King of the Danforth, the Duke of the Danforth, and many other monikers, but the bottom line is, Saul Korman is one haymishe Greek dude.

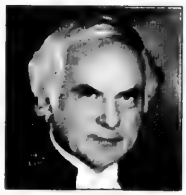
Montrealer named to Supreme Court

First Jewish appointee since Bora Laskin

Morris Fish of Montreal has become the second Jewish person named to the Supreme Court of Canada. The first was the late Bora Laskin, who stepped down as chief justice in 1984.

The appointment was widely applauded by lawyers, jurists and laypeople.

Fish, 64, a Quebec Court of Appeal justice, was appointed last Thursday by the federal Justice Department to fill the vacancy left by the retirement of Charles Gonthier of Quebec.



Justice Morris Fish

Fish's name has frequently been suggested for a seat on the highest court. He is the first Quebec anglophone named to the Supreme Court in decades.

Fish was a star criminal lawyer before being appointed directly to the Quebec Court of Appeal in 1989, and served as special counsel to the Quebec commission of inquiry into the construction industry in 1974 and to the Security Intelligence Review Committee of Canada from 1985-89.

He was a partner in the Montreal law firm of Cohen, Leithman, Kaufman, Yarosky, Yarosky & Fish and its successor firms from 1967-89.

Fish received his law degree from McGill University in 1962, and was editor-in-chief of the McGill Daily before the student newspaper became known for its radicalism. He is currently chair of the McGill law faculty advisory board, which assists the dean.

In addition to the Bar of Quebec, he was also a member of the Alberta and Prince Edward Island bars. He became a Queen's Counsel in 1984.

BOOSTING MEDICAL RESEARCH: Actor Christopher Reeve was the guest of the Israel Defence Forces disabled veterans organization last week at Beit Halochem Tel Aviv, where he witnessed a basketball game on wheelchairs and a performance of the dance troupe on wheelchairs, Hora on Wheels. Rona Ramon

'Ilan started something unique'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The widow of Israel Air Force colonel Ilan Ramon, one of the seven astronauts who perished aboard NASA's Space Shuttle Columbia on Feb. 1, is determined to carry on her husband's legacy.

"He brought unity to our people and delivered to them a message of hope and peace. I will not let that stop because he's not here.

"It is unfortunate that circumstances have called for me to continue my husband's mission, but as his partner, it is up to me," said Rona Ramon, 39, in a telephone interview from her home in Houston, Tex.

Ilan Ramon, who was Israel's first astronaut, brought some hope and positive spirit to Israelis during a long, hard period, she said, "when it was easy to lose hope. [He showed] them that they are special people, and that message still needs to be emphasized.

The News in Brief

Canada

Tamir B'nai Mitzvah

OTTAWA — Four men and four women with developmental disabilities took part recently in a group bar and bat mitzvah as part of Tamir's Judaic Outreach Program. The B'nai Mitzvah program, which was inaugurated last year, was held at Agudath Israel Synagogue.

Immigration Up

WINNIPEG — The number of Jewish Argentine families in Winnipeg tripled over the past year, jumping from 26 to 78 and bringing the total to more than 200 people. Jewish community officials expect to receive inquiries from 30 to 40 additional families in the next six months as Jews attempt to leave economically ravaged Argentina.

Canadian Jailed

OTTAWA — The government of Lebanon has jailed a Canadian man for travelling to Israel. Bruce Balfour, who was visiting Lebanon as part of the Cedars of Lebanon reforestation project in association with the Maranatha Evangelistic Association, has been held in custody since July 10. In a letter to the Canadian ambassador in Lebanon, Balfour said, "My freedom has been taken away and I have been treated horribly." Lebanon does not allow entry to travellers carrying a passport stamped by Israel.

Israel

Kidnappings Urged

JERUSALEM — An aide to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat said Palestinians should kidnap Israelis to use them as bargaining chips for Palestinian prisoners held by Israel. Ahmed Jbarra, whom Israel recently released from jail as a confidence-building measure, made the comments at a rally in Bethlehem. Jbarra served 28 years for planting a bomb that killed 14 people in downtown Jerusalem in 1975.

Black Hebrews

JERUSALEM — Israel has given permanent resident status to the Black Hebrew community. The decision by Interior Minister Avraham Poraz means the 2,000 Black Hebrews will be able to serve in the army. The Black Hebrews, African Americans who emigrated from the United States, believe they are descended from the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel.

World

Jews For Jesus Ad

LONDON — British Jews are demanding that a Jews for Jesus billboard be taken down. The poster in a Jewish neighbourhood of London features a group of haredi Jews at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, one of whom is wearing a Jews for Jesus T-shirt with the caption "Think for yourself." The Jewish Board of Deputies wrote to the Advertising Standards Authority that the "advertisement is clearly based on the principle that the majority of Jews are unable to 'think for themselves' – i.e., believe in Jesus. This is a highly objectionable notion."

Web Site Shut Down

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An anti-Semitic Web site that posed as a "Who's Who for Jews" has been shut down. Hoozajew.org was "little more than a cyberden for anti-Semites," the Anti-Defamation League said. The site included lists of Jews in various professions, with each section concluding Jews were over-represented in that field.

Trial Delayed

ATLANTA — A U.S. judge has delayed the trial of Eric Rudolph, a white supremacist suspected of involvement in a deadly bombing of a Birmingham abortion clinic and the 1996 Olympic Park bombing in Atlanta. The judge said both sides need more time to prepare for the case.

U.S. Poll

NEW YORK — More than 70 per cent of both U.S. Jews and Arabs back the road map peace plan, according to a new poll conducted by Americans for Peace Now and the Arab American Institute. The poll found that 95 per cent of Arab Americans back Israel's right to exist.

President Backtracks

NEW YORK — Romanian President Ion Iliescu has backed away from remarks that downplayed the Holocaust, saying he recognized the uniqueness of the Nazi campaign against the Jews. Ion's statement came two days after he told Ha'aretz, "the Holocaust was not unique to the Jewish population in Europe. Many others, including Poles, died in the same way." He stated later: "I merely wanted to put the Holocaust, the most tragic event in the modern history of humanity, in the larger framework of Nazi totalitarian rule, which left millions of European citizens dead. The fact that Jews were the primary target of the criminal policies of Nazi Germany and its allies or satellites is a truth which cannot be doubted."

Hope Helped European Jews

NEW YORK — Comedian Bob Hope, who died last week at age 100, volunteered in 1944 to perform at a World War II show to benefit endangered European Jews.

Fifty-nine years ago, Hope performed at a Madison Square Garden benefit for the Emergency Committee to Save the Jewish People of Europe. The show took place as the Allies were refusing to take action to stop the mass killing of Jews in concentration camps, scholar Rafael Medoff wrote.

"This was not merely another benefit concert for a worthy cause," the director of the David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies wrote in the Jewish Press. "For Hope to support the controversial Emergency Committee took real political courage."

Aliyah program offers free schooling in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The New York-based director of North American aliyah offices was in Toronto recently to launch a new project offering three years of high school in Israel for free.

Michael Landsberg, executive director of the Israel Aliyah Delegation, North America (www.aliyah.org), said in an interview at Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre that the "Elite Academy" program offers air fare, free tuition and free room and board for North American teens to attend religious or secular schools in Israel, "no strings attached." Students are also matched with a foster family with whom they can spend weekends and holidays.

Given the high cost of Jewish education in Canada, Landsberg, who oversees 18 aliyah offices including two in Canada (Toronto and Montreal), said he thought this program – which is funded by the Jewish Agency and the Israeli government, and has been running for almost 10 years with European, Latin American and Australian students – would suit the needs of the Jewish community here as well. Students must pass psychological and academic tests to qualify for the program.

Even without publicity, Landsberg said, his office has fielded 30 applicants from across North America, 10 of whom are going in September.

From an aliyah standpoint, "these kids tend to bring their parents later on to stay with them in Israel," said Landsberg. "If the kids can make it, they are paving the way for their parents. If not, it's win/win for our people. The chances that they'll intermarry are slimmer, and the chances that they will one day be writing in the Jewish newspaper or be active in the Jewish federation are bigger if they go through an experience like this."

Michael Landsberg

Free university education is also offered to new olim up to age 27: three years of study towards a BA is offered to those under 25, and two years towards a Master's degree, as long as the students are 27 or under when they begin.

The university benefit is not new, said Landsberg, but it is not well known in North America.

Since Landsberg, a sabra and son of Holocaust survivors, took on his new position in January, he has been trying to reframe North American ideas about aliyah. "The whole concept of aliyah is really creating a difficulty for the Jewish people – the thought that someone has to uproot everything they have and go somewhere else forever and ever, with a moral commitment that it must work, is really frightening," he said.

"Instead of this, I think we should talk to people about what they need. Let's say they need education, or an adventure – let's offer that in Israel."

Another pilot project in Toronto is designed for professionals in about 10 different areas, including medicine, nursing, pharmacy, biology, chemistry and engineering, all of which are in demand in Israel, said Landsberg. The program includes Hebrew ulpan, language instruction specific to each profession, facilitating recognition of Canadian certification, and employment.

Despite the intifadah in Israel, aliyah from North America has increased over the past two years, said Landsberg. In 2002, 2,040 North Americans moved to Israel, an increase over the previous year's 1,600 olim.

Aliyah by Canadians increased 21.6 per cent from 2001 to 2002, said Landsberg. Seventy-four Canadians made aliyah in the first five months of this year, he added.

This year, an estimated 1,200 to 1,300 North Americans will have made aliyah by the end of July, he said.

In addition to free education initiatives, Landsberg is touting other programs that promote aliyah, such as Hebrew language study for credit at a kibbutz ulpan; internship programs in a variety of professions; and volunteering for Magen David Adom.

For Jews to make aliyah when Israel is experiencing difficult times is "the best Zionist answer we have," said Landsberg.

And if people decide they don't want to stay in Israel? "We'll just have another devoted activist later on," he said. "What are we losing?"

Thoughtful reactions needed

From the editor's desk

Last month, The CJN carried an article under the headline "Sociologist questions Jewish population study." In it, York University sociologist Prof. Leo Davids raised certain questions regarding the conclusions reached by UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) about the Jewish population of Canada from the reported data of the 2001 federal census.

The article understandably generated some resentment within the UIAFC because of certain statements that appeared to question the motives of UIAFC officials in arriving at their conclusions.

But as Prof. Davids himself emphasized in a letter to the editor (CJN, July 31), his statements were never intended to disparage the "excellent work by the federations" nor was he engaging in "any UIA or federation bashing."

His only purpose in publicly airing his concerns was, as he said, to explore the "scientific-philosophical problem of who shall be counted into the community on the basis of Canadian census data."

Prof. Davids would surely say his disagreement with the UIAFC was one that our ancient sages would have characterized as "le shaim shamayim," namely, for the sake of heaven, that is, for the sake of striving for truth.

But overlooked in their difference of opinion is the fact that interpretative, methodological and other differences of opinion are commonplace in relation to population surveys.

Calvin Goldscheider, a professor of sociology at Brown University and himself a critic of the design and organization of the National Jewish Population Survey 2000-01 released last year in the United States, offered the following perspective about all demographic studies.

Writing in the Forward last October, Goldscheider said: "There are and will be critics of this study, and properly so. Community studies should generate thoughtful reactions…

"The researchers undoubtedly are aware of the limitations of the study, probably as much as the outsiders who will identify the flaws. But let us not be distracted by the detractors: This study will be mined for insights about the Jewish community [in the United States] for the next decade. What is important is that the study be used for more than simply justifying and rationalizing existing Jewish communal policies."

Goldscheider says the numbers should not be ignored. But he virtually pleads with the reader and with Jewish communal leaders not to focus solely on those numbers.

"As a demographer, I want to reinforce that estimates of the total number of Jews [in the United States] are the least important part of the study's message. We shall miss the value of the study if we become fixated over the number of Jews counted this way or that way."

What, then, is the real value of such population studies? Goldscheider articulates what he believes it to be.

"Mostly we should be learning about the challenges that the Jewish community will face because of the aging population, changes in the roles of men and women, changes in Jewish education and emerging Jewish cultural alternatives to religion among Jews who are secular…

"We should not be derailed by those who are seeking [and finding] the limitations of research. All social science research is limited. Nor should we be distracted by those who only see evidence of demographic decline and erosion, who cannot take "yes" for an answer. Cautiously, and with due appreciation, we should use the results of the enormous effort to understand ourselves and meet the challenges of a voluntary community that has experienced transformations."

I venture to say there would be no difference of opinion between Prof. Davids and the UIAFC on that.

On July 3 in this space, I wrote about Jennifer and Adrienne Gould, two sisters from Ottawa, accomplished members of the Stratford Festival of Canada company of players.

They are both featured in the festival's production of Gigi; Jennifer plays the lead role.

Last week, I saw another Stratford play, in which Jennifer plays one of the lead roles: The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

I could hardly believe it was the same person whom I saw in Gigi transform herself from a young, innocent, churlish waif to a more experienced, maturing debutante.

In Hunchback, Gould plays the captivating, raven-haired, gypsy girl La Esmeralda. There is certainly nothing jaunty about her performance or about the play.

Adapted by Rick Whelan from the novel of the same name by the celebrated French author Victor Hugo, the play depicts the misery of life on the streets of 15th-century Paris, a city where cruelty and ignorance run in preying pairs through the night.

The play explores broad, universal themes that affect the entirety of the human condition: poverty, bigotry, hypocrisy, cowardice, courage, beauty and love. But it is dark, with terrifying scenes and harsh, visually, jarring messages.

From the very first moment she enters the stage, Gould is mesmerizing. She holds our attention with her every movement. The role calls forth a heartbreaking range of emotions from a character who is demonized, abused, brutalized, spurned and tortured.

It is an entertaining, moving and compellingly strong production.

Toronto lawyer works for peace in the Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Commercial litigation lawyer Stuart Chelin is a volunteer with a difference.

Chelin, a partner in the Toronto law firm of Solomon Rothbart Goodman, is currently on a sabbatical in Israel, working for the Peres Center for Peace in Tel Aviv on a pro bono basis.

Peres Centre aims to raise socio-economic standards, foster democracy

Founded in 1996 by Shimon Peres, Israel's former prime minister and now interim leader of the Labour party, the centre is a non-partisan, non-profit organization dedicated to promoting and reinforcing peace in the Middle East.

The centre, which is headed by Uri Savir, the former director general of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, achieves its objectives through a wide range of co-operative programs and projects.

The ultimate objective of the centre, whose primary focus is Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, is to create a "new Middle East" by raising socio-economic standards and fostering democracy.

"In layman's terms, the concept is simple, yet effective," said Chelin, who has been at the centre since mid-June and plans to leave in the middle of August.

"Get the people involved in the Arab-Israeli conflict to work together in order to foster goodwill and understanding in a micro manner. If you change or help enough people, one by one, hopefully peace will come, or there will be a more fertile ground for peace."

Peace is made by governments, of course. "But it is the people, living side by side, who put peace into effect," observed Chelin, who studied economics at the University of Western Ontario and earned a law degree at McGill University.

Chelin, 37, has no specific job title or function at the centre but he is involved with several fund-raising proposals.

"I am assisting with developing a plan to raise the profile of the centre in Canada, as well as dealing with some administrative and legal matters touching on Canadian activities in this region."

In this connection, he is also trying to stage an indoor soccer game in Toronto pitting a club composed of Israeli and Palestinian players against a local team consisting of politicians, actors and athletes.

Chelin, who describes his politics as right of centre in Israeli terms, said he became a vounteer because a viable and lasting peace is manifestly in Israel's interest.

"A continual effort must be made toward that objective, or it will never happen," he warned.

Stuart Chelin

He is impressed by the range of the centre's eclectic projects.

"There are agricultural programs whereby crop yields are maximized, new seeds or strains of wheat are developed and water management is taught and improved, all in an effort to ensure a sustainable level of food for the Palestinian community."

In addition, there are drama workshops and a sports program. In the past, there was a computer training program.

The centre's medical progams, through which Israeli ophthalmologists and obstetricians treat Palestinian patients, have also been useful.

Asked whether the centre's goal of a "new Middle East" is still achievable after the outbreak of the intifadah, Chelin said, "I continue to believe in that vision for two reasons. One is an overall faith in human beings. Second, and perhaps more important and certainly more utilitarian, is that giving up on that vision means giving up on hope for the future. How can anyone ever give up on the hope of peace and security for Israel?"

Nonetheless, he admits he has been plagued by moments of doubt.

"There is an element in Palestinian society which vows never to accept Israel. How long it will take to root out that element, or to push it to the extreme margins, I can't say.

"Lasting peace is possible, but it may take a number of generations or re-education and other peace-building efforts until the necessary elements for a lasting peace are in place."

The centre's greatest problem is a lack of funds.

"We can sit in a room for an hour and devise dozens of worthwhile projects and programs," said Chelin. "But without money to carry them out, they remain nothing more than mere ideas. "

Thornhill couple adapts to new home in Israel

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

When the Zettels stepped off the jumbo jet at Ben-Gurion airport last month, Israeli soldiers quickly flocked toward the family to relieve them of their heavy luggage.

"I felt a tremendous sense of relief. We got off the plane and realized we'd done it," said Suzi Zettel on the phone from her new home in Ramat Beit Shemesh, an English-speaking community about halfway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Harry and Suzi Zettel left a comfortable life in Thornhill to realize their dream of making aliyah with their five children, who range in age from three months to 11 years.

They are seven of nearly 1,000 North American Jews to immigrate to Israel this summer through Nefesh B'Nefesh, an organization that gives grants based on financial need to Jews who wouldn't otherwise make aliyah.

The organization also has social workers, psychologists and headhunters who take care of more logistical matters such as enrolling children in school and finding employment. To ease the stress of starting a new life in a new country, olim are matched with "buddy" families in the same neighbourhood, who have already established themselves.

Twelve North American families greeted the Zettels upon their arrival in Ramat Beit Shemesh, which Suzi said is "much more beautiful than I remembered."

Harry said he was pleased to see a welcome home note on his front door. Their neighbours provided mattresses, bedding, and other amenities while the family waited for the shipment of their belongings to arrive.

"Everyone who's here has done this. They know what we need because they've been through it," said Suzi,

While Suzi and Harry had seen photos of their new apartment on the Internet, they didn't get a good sense of what it would actually be like. While smaller than they had imagined, Suzi said their new home is "exactly what we need. It suits us."

Rabbi Yehoshua Fass, the co-founder of Nefesh B'Nefesh, said one of the biggest concerns is how children will integrate into Israeli society.

"I think it's a bigger shock to the parents than it is for the children," he said.

Suzi and Harry say their children are adjusting well to Israeli life. They have no qualms about allowing them to play outside on their own – especially on Shabbat when there are no cars on the road.

"There's more freedom here for them," said Harry.

Rabbi Fass said another way that Nefesh B'Nefesh helps new olim integrate is by providing students with Hebrew crash courses 25 hours a week for the first four months so they can catch up with their Israeli classmates.

Not everything has gone smoothly. The Zettels ran into some problems with their oldest daughter, Daniella's schooling.

The Zettel family

Although they had enrolled her in class long before moving to Israel, they arrived to find that there was no place for her at the neighbourhood school. While disappointed and discouraged, Harry and Suzi said they are in the process of working out the mishap.

"This is the only thing that's bogged us down," said Suzi.

The new olim have also had to deal with the more banal bureaucratic aspects of immigrating to a new country. The Zettels have already set up bank accounts, applied for health insurance, and got their Israeli drivers licenses.

"[The government workers] bent over backwards to help us," said Suzi.

Because of the grant from Nefesh B'Nefesh, Harry will be able to settle his family into their new home before finding a new job.

"I've worked for the past 18 years. We've never starved. I'm sure I'll find something. It may not be the ideal job at first but like anyone, we'll find our way," said Harry who worked as a trustee in bankruptcy in Canada.

Suzi said one of the least important things she worried about before immigrating was terrorism.

"I think people are preoccupied with the safety. People tell me, 'If you want a list of something to worry about it, that doesn't even come on it,'" she said.

Rabbi Fass said there is a "tremendous" waiting list of North Americans wanting to make aliyah though the organization this summer.

He said in these difficult times many Diaspora Jews want to strengthen the State of Israel by moving there.

"Standing on the sidelines, it's very difficult to feel closely connected with Israel," he said.

It was a difficult decision to make, but now that the Zettels have made aliyah, they're taking it one challenge at a time.

"The fact is, the hardest is over. We're here. We've done it. Now we've got to get on with it," said Suzi.

Local presidents committed to organizations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It's easy to find something in common among the new presidents of three local women's service organizations.

They all joined as a way to make new friends, and they all stayed because they became passionate about the organizations' work.

Judy Zelikovitz

When Judy Zelikovitz, president of Toronto Hadassah WIZO, moved from Toronto to Sudbury – where she lived until 1997– she was given a free membership to the organization as a way of welcoming her to the community.

"Within a small Jewish community, it is important to be involved and active. Whereas in Toronto you can be Jewish by osmosis, in a small town you have to create an identity," says Zelikovitz, whose two-year term began last month.

"We are blessed here with new chapters forming all the time and with having a membership of about 3,000 women. The challenge, however, is that everyone is busy and they have to make an extra effort to remain involved."

The strength of the organization is in its grassroots members, she says. "They understand that conditions in Israel are grave and that there are over half a million children living below the poverty line.

"When we discuss bleak realities, people are willing to give their time to help."

Members can gain new leadership skills through a new Hadassah-WIZO program that will teach women the necessary skills to take on increasingly responsible roles within the organization, she says. "I am proud that the organization has shown faith in my own leadership skills."

During her term, she would like to see membership expand and donations increase, and to that end she asks that friends of Hadassah remember the organization with a gift in their estate. Money goes to support the organization's many projects in Israel, including daycare centres, technological high schools and services for women and children.

Marcie Weinman

A major fundraiser is the annual Hadassah Bazaar, set this year for Oct. 29 at the Canadian National Exhibition's Better Living Centre. "As soon as one bazaar is done, we start planning for the next," she says.

Marcie Weinman, president, National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, is a lawyer who joined the organization about nine years ago during a year off work.

"I organized a panel about menopause, and then I got involved on the executive. I haven't looked back."

She considers her two-year term as president a full-time job, she says.

"I oversee all of council's activities and determine the direction we want the organization to take. We see what needs there are in the community and we try to meet them."

Among the projects she has planned are Jewish genetic awareness education, a program for women coming out of shelters, and programs about mental health issues.

In an attempt to broaden its membership, Weinman says, the organization has started a group for 15- and 16-year-old girls. "We would like them to get involved in council and discover the importance of community service work. Although older members are invaluable, we can always use a young voice."

Rhona Ash

Not only are these teens helping out, she says, they are gaining tremendous skills they can take into the business world.

Rhona Ash, president of Jewish Women International Toronto Council, says the goal of her one-year term is to energize the organization by bringing in innovative programs and events.

Ash, the assistant to the principal of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), realizes the time constraints women are under and says there are ways to remain involved if they find it difficult to come out on a regular basis.

"They can help knit for our Mountain of Mittens project, collect socks to be distributed to the homeless, or sell tickets to various events. I want to make it easy for women to join, and let them know that anything they have to offer is valuable."

Along with her three vice-presidents, Ash says she plans to attend individual chapter programs to meet members and let them know the executive is committed to the organization.

Ending terror not on PA's agenda

Personal relations between U.S. President George W. Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon are warm and collegial. That was evident last week in Washington as the two leaders met to discuss the American-initiated road map for peace between Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA). But there are disquieting signs of renewed trouble ahead for Israel for which the positive personal relationship between the two men will be no breakwater.

Evidence suggests that Israel will soon be engulfed by new waves of violence and terror.

Israel's Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz met with PA Minister for Security Affairs Mohammed Dahlan last week to try to reach agreement on enhanced mutual security arrangements. The meeting ended without agreement, but with a promise to meet again.

According to reports in Ha'aretz, "Mofaz demanded that the PA take action against the terrorist infrastructure" as required under the road map agreement that PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas signed not two months ago.

Some media reports suggested that Mofaz called on Dahlan to stop production of Qassem surface missiles whose range was being extended to enable them to reach oil installations in Ashkelon. Mofaz reportedly also asked Dahlan to stop the arms smuggling from Egypt through tunnels in Rafah that had been stepped up since the signing of the ceasefire.

Dahlan refused Mofaz' requests.

Indeed he refused to commit to fulfilling any of his government's promises to disarm the terrorist organizations. What's worse, he disavowed it.

"The terror infrastructure is an Israeli concept that is unacceptable to us," Dahlan told Israeli reporters. "We will not arrest activists and we will not confront them as long as the ceasefire is intact."

Dahlan thereby effectively admitted that the so-called ceasefire is merely tactical, a reorganizational respite for the terrorist forces he is either incapable of or unwilling to confront. His admission followed by a week a similar declaration by Abbas that "cracking down on Hamas, Jihad and the Palestinian organizations was not an option at all."

Why do western governments and the media not call the PA leadership to account for their blatant duplicity? Why do western governments only berate and chide Israel about the fence or the release of Palestinian prisoners?

Why do they constantly allow the PA leadership to set the road map agenda when the road map obviously means nothing to them?

Mofaz and Dahlan met the day after IDF soldier Oleg Shaichat was buried. He had been kidnapped and murdered a week before. It is painfully obvious that the PA has an agenda, but ending terror and attaining true peace with Israel appears not to be on it.

Correcting the record

Many thanks for your kind words and complimentary remarks on my work in your article, "The courage not to play ball" ("According to reports," CJN, May 8).

In the spirit of accurate journalism, I'd like to set the record straight about a couple of things. First of all, to my great shame, I don't speak Arabic at all, in contrast to what is stated in the article. As Moscow bureau chief, I do speak fluent Russian, but that did me little good in Baghdad!

Which brings me to my second point. I relied very heavily on my Iraqi producer, Majed Kadim, for much of the information I was able to broadcast about the situation in Iraq. Yes, I was followed closely and the restrictions made telling the story difficult. But Majed took the real risks to get the story out by not censoring what he heard or knew. I was aware of personal danger, but the worst I thought could happen was I would be kicked out of the country and CTV might not be allowed another reporter there. But Majed spent months in jail for assisting journalists in the past, and certainly jeopardized his life to give me a glimpse of what was really going on. He even told me he was writing reports on what we were doing for the secret police, but that he was only mentioning what restaurants we ate at!

I could tell by the way the authorities treated me that Majed was not revealing any of the forbidden things we spoke about or anything I said in my reports. It was a conspiracy to protect each other while trying to get the story told, and both of us wanted that more than anything.

At the time, I was not ever able to mention Majed's name on the air or even on the phone, at his request. But now, I am glad it can be spoken. CTV's coverage of Iraq owes everything to him, and he is the unsung hero.

Liberals' masquerade

Your July 17 article "12 Liberal MPs, senators urge shift in Mideast policy" highlights a geo-political masquerade planned across Canada by the Liberal party and its caucus to attract voters in ridings with a large Jewish population.

It is ironic that for several years, the Liberals never disapproved in Parliament of the United Nations anti-Israel resolutions. They never complained to Canadian cabinet ministers but accepted derogatory insults spewed at the State of Israel in various international conferences.

At other times, the well-learned and well-informed Canadian representatives chose to abstain from voting on anti-Israel resolutions rather than displease Canadian Arab voters and supporters. The politicians mentioned in the article have acted in a manner that is opposite to fair play. They never openly expressed their personal views and concerns to the media.

Now in expectation of possibly losing their seats in the next federal election, this group is eagerly suggesting new solutions to the Israeli-Palestinian problem from a Canadian perspective. They are intent on safeguarding their position.

Political opportunism

Regarding your report on the 12 Liberal MPs and senators pushing for a more favourable Canadian policy toward Israel, at the risk of being accused of cynicism, I would like to note that these MPs represent areas with large Jewish populations and that the next federal election is not that far away ("12 Liberal MPs, senators urge shift in Mideast policy," CJN, July 17). I would be somewhat more encouraged if the group included the prime minister, the deputy prime minister, the minister of foreign affairs, or for that matter, a single cabinet minister. For that matter, why not a general policy statement for the entire Liberal caucus? I am afraid the only conclusion to be drawn is that we are witnessing group political opportunism.

Same-sex marriages not traditional

Contrary to Adrienne Rosen's assertion (CJN, Letters to the Editor, July 10), there are absoutely no credible responsa permitting same-sex marriage. Not one. There couldn't be, because there are no sources in traditional Judaism to support such a position.

The prohibitions against both male and female homosexuality are explicit and are listed in the three major codes of Jewish law: Rambam, the Tur and the Shulchan Aruch (Even Ha'ezer, 20 and 24).

In the commentaries on the relevant biblical and talmudic passages upon which the Jewish law rulings are based, there are indeed references to the same-sex marriage behaviours of the nation-tribes surrounding the developing Jewish nation. But the comments are always scornful, delivered in a tone of ridicule and highly negative.

The one specific talmudic reference to same-sex marriage (Chullin 92) indicates that the early pagans observed only three of the most minimally normative behaviours expected of "civilized" human society – and disallowing same-sex marriages was one of those three.

For those who are looking for a more recent, "liberal" viewpoint, the one talmudic scholar of note produced by the Reform movement, the late Solomon Freehoff, was asked such a question and did write a responsum, and in its sources and outcome, his conclusions were exactly the same as those produced by the most haredi of authorities.

Rosen can bring her partner to the most haredi shul on the planet to pray – as long as they don't propagandize. The religious guidelines of tzniut – modesty – prevent anyone from being nosy and asking them about their private sexual practices. But she cannot negate 1,000 years of traditional responsa with trite pop sociology.

Israel's appeasement habits

By SALLY F. ZERKER

What is it about us Jews that we have leaders who are ever so quick to appease their enemies? That's what I think Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is doing with unwarranted unilateral concessions to the Palestinians, in the context of the so-called road map peace plan, just as the late Yitzhak Rabin did with the Oslo accords.

Appeasement was and is dangerous. I thought the 1938 Munich conference and British prime minister Neville Chamberlain taught us for all time the perils of appeasement. But apparently not for our Jewish leaders.

Undoubtedly, that self-same menace was in action when Rabin, who never even asked the Palestinians to live up to their end of the Oslo agreements, consistently found excuses for their murderous acts of terror, and insisted that no matter what evil they perpetrated on the Israeli and Jewish people, their acts would not halt the "peace process." Now, Sharon is doing much the same, saying that terror doesn't end in a moment, letting the Palestinians regroup through a hudna, a supposed ceasefire that Muslim tradition teaches as a measure for deceiving enemies and strengthening themselves for the next round of war. Worse, he is actually releasing terrorists in response to the hudna when that is not even part of the road map.

Meanwhile, Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas has openly declared that he has no intention of disarming and dismantling Palestinian terrorist organizations, even though he signed the road map with this essential provision. Yet despite this condemnable dismissal, the Israeli cabinet has conceded to the release of hundreds of proven terrorists.

> 'Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas has openly declared that he has no intention of disarming and dismantling Palestinian terrorist organizations'

The question is, why? Why did Rabin and his leftist colleagues do what no other nation has ever done in history – that is, arm its enemies? I used to attribute this madness to the self-deception that was inseparable from leftist ideology. But I can no longer assign blame to leftist illusions, since I now see similar submissions made by the rightists under Sharon. So, what is the source of this Jewish sickness? Why is it that Israeli leaders still get weak in the knees when outside authorities come to court them?

When I asked this question of Rabbi J. Benjamin Friedberg, rabbi emeritus of Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto, he suggested that such acquiescent behaviour is due to an inept quality of Jewish national leaders, that they still have the spirit of shtetl Yiddin. By that I take it, he means they are abnormally fearful of perceived external power, a fear that although it was realistic and justifiable in pre-statehood conditions, is exaggerated and unwarranted given Israel's current state power. The corollary of that understanding is that Israeli leaders have failed to appreciate what is appropriate exercise of state power and what is not. Shtetl Yiddin were indeed powerless, and their strategy of survival involved succumbing to those in powerful positions, but the current Israeli reality is far from that powerlessness.

I don't disagree with this view, but I have another way of interpreting this appalling Jewish phenomenon. Some years ago, I wrote an article in the Middle East Focus in which I took an academic's approach on the nature of Israeli leadership. The point I made then, following from the analytical method of the late, great Canadian scholar, Harold Innis, was that Jews had learned enormously successful techniques for survival without the foundation of a geographical base – what Innis called "time-biased characteristics." However, just coming out of 2,000 years of Jewish exile, they lacked a "space-biased balance" – that is, they lacked the essential understanding of the true nature of state power and its uses.

I wrote the article just after Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's visit to Jerusalem. At the time, I had some hope, if not assured confidence, that actual, on-the-ground experience of statehood, through the exercises of diplomacy, through assessments of its own military strength in addition to that of its enemies, through the correct evaluation of the deep-rootedness of Palestinian terrorism, would allow this much-needed space-bias balance to evolve and strengthen. Now I can see that my hopes were unfounded. Appeasement is the symptom of powerlessness, of Rabbi Friedberg's shtetl Yiddin, not of a political reality.

Of course, some would argue Israel is actually not a free agent to act in its own best interests, but rather is limited by its position as a client state of the United States. Hence, Israeli leaders have no choice but to bend to the will of their "master." Those who hold to this point of view are in fact asserting a condition of powerlessness for Israel not unlike that of the days of the shtetl Yiddin. I am not naive about Israel's dependency on the United States, but I still believe that Israel has a great deal more flexibility to act in accordance with its own interests than we can observe from the performed record of its leaders.

As an example, let's look at the demand the Palestinians recently made, and to which the Sharon government conceded, to release Palestinian prisoners. Sharon could have presented several strong arguments to counter this demand by U.S. President George W. Bush instead of conceding. He could have argued, firstly, that this demand is not part of the terms of the road map but is a unilateral demand, upon which continuation of the hudna, which is temporary and strategic for Palestinian benefit, is based.

At the White House last month, President George W. Bush received Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas and then three days later, Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. The president was seeking to advance his guests along the "road map" to peace. [RNS/Reuters photos]

Secondly, he could have argued that the Palestinians refuse to live up to the essential term of the road map, that is, the dismantling of the terrorist infrastructure. And his third and most persuasive argument could have been that adding strength to Palestinian terrorist operations is against the interests of the United States.

Appeasement is making concessions, and sacrificing your principles as a result, in order to soothe or satisfy others' appetite or prejudice. If you look at the history of the Arab-Israeli conflict, it is obvious that the Palestinian appetite and prejudice have not been placated by even the most desperate yielding on the part of Israel.

Let's look back and examine the record. Palestinian appetite was not satiated by the United Nations partition plan in 1947, or by the handover of "every inch" of land that Sadat demanded, or by the recognition of the Palestinian Liberation Organization by Rabin, or by the importation and arming of thousands of Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat's thugs from Tunis, or by the Oslo agreements' open access for Palestinians, or by former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's withdrawal from Hebron and the transfer of power over Hebron to the PA, or by the financial aid that Israel has made available to Arafat, or by whatever else you can conjure up from recent history.

No good has come to Israel from all these risky undertakings. In fact, the contrary is true. The Palestinians are still training their young to kill and hate Jews, they persist in publishing maps of the land west of the Jordan River with no mention of Israel – maps that tell the tale of their true ambitions – and instead of their terrorist operations being dismantled, there is every expectation they will be allowed to recoup from recent Israeli military measures that did indeed wound them.

Most tragically, the number of terror victims in Israel, young and old, has been enhanced by these repeated concessions, particularly from the beginning of the Oslo appeasement until now. Nothing Sharon has said or done subsequent to the road map contrivance gives me comfort that he appreciates the dire consequences of such acts. This habit of appeasement by the leaders of Israel has inflicted immense harm on the country and its people in the past – on its security, its economy, its diplomacy – and it can do nothing but continue to exact a huge cost in the future.

Opinions

Memories, Oshy and the Chevrah

I can well recall my departure from Johannesburg 25 years ago. There was, of course, the restless anticipation of just wanting to get to Canada – to find a place to live, to start working and to begin adjusting to the many changes that I knew I would face in the weeks and months that lay ahead.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But aside from the excitement, I also remember the pervasive sense of ambivalence that seemed always to accompany my decision to emigrate. While there were many reasons for such vacillation, the most difficult had to do with family, or more particularly, separation from family.

For there was always the realization that my parents could not, and would not, leave South Africa. There was also the realization that as they grew older, their health would begin to fail and there would undoubtedly come a time when they might not recover. Sadly, that time has come and gone for both my mother and my father – and all of their siblings.

My story is hardly unique; it is the story told by many thousands of South Africans of my generation, scatterlings from a once extraordinary Jewish community who are now living in Canada, the United States, Britain, Australia and Israel. It is the story of a population of expatriates who have been deeply and collectively concerned about the community they left behind.

And with good reason. In the early 1970s, there were an estimated 120,000 Jews in South Africa. This number has fallen to around 80,000. So it is not too surprising that, with an inevitably shrinking (and less affluent) donor base, welfare agencies that were once generously supported are now finding it increasingly difficult to sustain themselves.

The Johannesburg Chevrah Kadisha is one of the more recognized charitable organizations, and it plays an essential part in preserving the fabric of Jewish life in that distant land. Though often perceived as only a burial society, the chevrah has, over the years, taken on a much broader role, attending to the aged and the infirm, providing crisis intervention services, engaging in remedial education and rehabilitation, and offering social assistance and employment counselling for those in need.

I recently attended a fundraiser in Toronto sponsored by the newly formed Canadian Friends of the South African Chevrah Kadisha (CAFSACK) and featuring the Sydenham Men's Choir from Johannesburg and its lead singer (and renowned chazzan), Oshy Tugendhaft.

Promoted as "a Jewish musical extravaganza depicting moments of Jewish history in music," the concert turned out to be much more than that. It tugged at the heart strings and brought back floods of memories. More importantly, it once again reminded me that, although our roots may be far away, it is our responsibility always to ensure that they not be forgotten or neglected.

Making the connection

Life in Israel before the advent of electronic mail and the Internet was a lot more sheltered and less interesting. Today, it's hard to imagine living in Israel without easy, near-instant access to the outside world via cyberspace.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Like for some two million other Israelis, going online has become an intrinsic part of my daily routine. The reason is simple. It greatly enlarges my sphere of knowledge and communication, on both the personal and professional levels. Equally important, it also makes me feel less removed from the rest of the planet, helping offset Israel's isolation in the Middle East.

Every morning before breakfast, I crank up the computer, log on and let my fingers loose on the keyboard connecting me to a world far beyond the confines of my little workroom in southern Jerusalem. Within seconds, my screen comes alive with a parade of words and images from across town and around the globe.

Invariably, the first catch of the day is a mix of sobering headlines from the Ha'aretz or the Jerusalem Post Web sites and personal letters from friends far away. Due to the huge time difference between Israel and North America, my early morning e-mail is mostly from people for whom it was the evening when they pressed the "send" button.

My day is now well underway. Before it is over, I will check my e-mail many times. This has become a compulsive habit for me. I use e-mail as tool not just for work but for maintaining personal bonds. Without it, I would feel adrift. Since I first got an account in 1998, it has increased considerably my contact with people, especially with those abroad. Receiving fresh, immediate correspondence from people I know – albeit cold, typewritten text – makes me feel more connected, more grounded. The fact that I never know what I will receive next further enhances the medium – and the message.

Sometimes it's at the saddest moments that I receive the most messages. Within hours, sometimes minutes, of a major terrorist attack in Jerusalem, friends, relatives and former colleagues abroad write me to express their concern and solidarity and to make sure my family and I are OK.

E-mail and the Internet have also helped me stay better informed about Israel, ironically often through material sent to me by people living in other countries. Friends frequently forward me articles, columns, press releases and other information relating to the Middle East. In addition, I receive various foreign-based, Israel-related newsletters through e-mail, ranging from those of www.honestreporting.com to the Britain Israel Communication and Research Center, that contain news I might not otherwise read.

As with most technological innovations, even the most welcome ones, e-mail also has its flipside. The ease with which messages can be transmitted can be a curse when you're on the receiving end of so much material. The sheer volume, including the interesting stuff, is often daunting. On most days, the overload can be a tough challenge for even the most open-minded speed-reader. Inevitably, many worthwhile items I receive don't get the attention they deserve. Likewise, there are surely times something I send out gets buried unread in the flood of other e-mail.

The main annoyance and scourge for e-mail users is spam, the unsolicited come-ons from advertisers offering mostly useless, tasteless and often pornographic products. Spam is the electronic equivalent of junk mail in your letterbox, only sleazier. More infuriating, most spam arrives in the guise of genuine e-mail with little hint of its true origin or commercial pitch.

One of the thrills of e-mail is to receive letters from long-lost friends or colleagues who have tracked you down thanks to the Internet. It's happened to me several times and I've also done the same in reverse. To reconnect with people after years, sometimes decades, can be a powerful experience, one even more intense for me given that I'm so physically removed from my past lives in Canada and France.

It's now five years since Internet first entered my home. Although it's become a daily staple, I still sometimes sit transfixed at my computer, mesmerized by the apparent magic of it all. I shudder to think what it would be like without it, and that includes the e-mail CJN readers send me in reaction to my columns.

Israel's 'fence' – the best hope for peace

According to public opinion polls, more than 70 per cent of Israelis consistently support completion of the "fence" to separate the Palestinian population in the West Bank regions of Judea and Samaria from Israeli territory.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Although the majority also support the road map and the latest attempt to end Palestinian violence through negotiation, Israelis have learned to be realistic. The past three years of terror have taught us that without fundamental and widespread changes in Palestinian attitudes, the current ceasefire will end in another round of violence, perhaps even more deadly than Palestinian President Yasser Arafat's post-Oslo terror campaign.

Taking these factors into consideration, and realizing that the status quo is unstable, Israelis recognize that physical separation – in other words, a border – provides the most realistic option for reducing the vulnerability to attack. Israelis have learned that pledges of peace, when they are heard, are ephemeral, but the construction of a fence has a very visible and immediate impact.

On this basis, construction of the separation barrier, with electronic sensors, concrete walls and patrol roads, began in June 2002 following escalating terror attacks. The northern portion, 128 kilometres long, and extending to Kfar Saba and around the Palestinian city of Qalkilya, has already been completed, as well as portions surrounding Jerusalem.

As the barrier goes up across the "seam line" between the two populations, the sense of increased security is immediate. Army statistics demonstrate a sharp decline in infiltration and terror attacks where the barrier has been completed, and as in the case of Lebanon, around Gaza and along the long border with Jordan, a security fence and intensive IDF monitoring of movements on the other side are highly effective measures in keeping out terrorists. The construction of a barrier to keep out Palestinian bombers is clearly Israel's best defence against another and more deadly round of violence.

Support for immediate separation is also propelled by recognition of the demographic threat to the Jewish and democratic nature of Israeli society. As Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has acknowledged, the majority population in a single political entity between the Mediterranean and the Jordan River will soon be Palestinian, and the Jewish population would become a minority in another Arab and Islamic state, thereby reversing the accomplishments of the Zionist movement and the re-establishment of Jewish self-determination. If the efforts to negotiate a two-state solution are again blocked by the Palestinians (precisely to trap Israel in this scenario), the alternative is separation through unilateral action and creation of a de facto border.

Taking these issues into account, the Palestinian campaign (conducted through the United States and the United Nations) is unlikely to stop construction.

However, in Israel, the debate on the route for the third stage, covering the line between the middle of the country and the northern outskirts of Jerusalem, is continuing. The supporters of a "minimalist" approach want to keep the fence close to the "Green Line" and to Ehud Barak's proposed map at the Camp David summit three years ago. This route would include the consensus settlements along the "Green Line" (not a pre-1967 border, as is often erroneously claimed), as well as the Etzion Bloc south of Jerusalem and perhaps Ariel, while many isolated settlements further to the east would be excluded.

In contrast, the "maximalists" advocate a route that is at least twice as long, in order to incorporate many of these isolated settlements. But the maximalist fence would also incorporate 110,000 Palestinians, (20 times more than the minimalist alternative) and would aggravate the demographic threat to the Jewish state, rather than the reverse. This would also add to the friction with the U.S. government, but, in contrast, the exclusion of many settlements could trigger demonstrations and violent confrontations against the policies of the Sharon government.

Thus, the decision on the route of the middle section of the separation fence will be difficult to make, and it will leave some people upset, but the alternative – delaying construction and leaving Israel vulnerable to terror – is far worse. Israelis recognize that completion of a barrier between the two populations is vitally necessary for our security and survival as a Jewish state.

The Kirshner File

Refugees found a safe haven in Trinidad

As one Jewish refugee poetically put it, Trinidad was "a shtetl beneath the palms." During the 1930s, this boot-shaped, sun-drenched Caribbean island, 11 kilometres north of Venezuela, became a safe haven for hundreds of European Jews fleeing persecution and poverty. They came from all corners of the continent, notably Poland, Romania, Germany and Italy.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

They were drawn to Trinidad & Tobago, as it is formally known, for a single compelling reason. Aside from Shanghai, China, this British colony, which attained independence in 1962, was one of the few places where a visa or a sponsor were not required. All that was needed was a refundable deposit of 50 pounds sterling, the equivalent of $250 (US)

This obscure footnote in history was documented in a privately printed booklet, Our Calypso Shtetl, published in 1998. It was brought to my attention by Suzan Hagstrom, an American journalist who knows Zeno Strasberg, a Toronto resident who was born and raised in Trinidad.

A Canadian-trained radiologist who hails from the southern town of San Fernando, Strasberg put me in touch with two other former Trinidadians: Lorna Yufe and Freda Ackelsberg. Yufe, from Ostrowiec, Poland, arrived in Port of Spain – the capital of Trinidad – with her mother and sister in 1936, having been sent for by her father, Henry Bricks, who had landed in Trinidad a year earlier. In 1983, she and her late husband, Manuel (Monia), who was originally from Nova Selitz, Bessarabia, came to Toronto. Ackelsberg, a mutual friend, lived in Trinidad from 1946 until 1983.

"We had a good life in Trinidad," said Yufe, who is 78. "We didn't acquire great wealth, but everyone was comfortable." Strasberg, 62, agreed. "We had an idyllic existence in Trinidad, and as time went on, things got better."

Yufe, whose sister Thora resides in Montreal, owes her idyl in Trinidad to her father, whom she described as an adventurous "wandering Jew." Eager to improve his family's prospects, he went to Colombia to seek his fortune. "I think he sold sacred pictures," she said. Colombia, however, disappointed Bricks, and he returned to Poland, only to set off for Honduras some years later. "He didn't like Honduras. It was very primitive." Finally, Bricks found a measure of contentment in Port of Spain, where he opened a clothing store on Frederick Street, the main shopping thoroughfare.

According to Arthur Siegel, the author of the introductory essay in Our Calypso Shtetl, the Jewish refugees in Trinidad – a Spanish domain sighted by Christopher Columbus in 1498 and claimed by Britain in 1797 – were merchants, garment and furniture manufacturers as well as doctors, lawyers and dentists. "We were a close-knit, vibrant community," said Yufe, speaking in a soft, lilting Trinidadian accent.

A converted house served as a synagogue, and in the absence of a rabbi, the men in the congregation conducted High Holy Day services. There was a Blue White soccer team, and a drama club staged plays, including King Lear, in Yiddish.

At its peak, Trinidad was home to approximately 600 Jews. Its Jewish population would have been considerably higher had the British governor not closed the gates to more Jewish refugees in January 1939. As a result, several ships from Germany carrying Jewish passengers were denied entry. During World War II, Jews from Germany, Austria and Italy were classified as "enemy aliens" and had to report daily to a police station.

Though she was far removed from the killing fields of Nazi-occupied Europe, Yufe heard incredible rumours about the wholesale slaughter of Jews. "We didn't exactly know what was happening, but we knew it wasn't good." After the Holocaust, she learned that her family, on both sides, had been murdered in Treblinka.

Curiously enough, Jews were often mistaken for Syrian Arabs, a thread in Trinidad's multicultural mosaic of British, African and East Indian citizens. "We got along with everyone, and we attended each other's weddings," said Yufe, referring in particular to the Trinidadians of Syrian origin.

Strasberg's biological father, Harry Rajfer of Staszow, Poland, who died when Strasberg was only two years old, immigrated to Trinidad in 1938 to join his brother, Eric. Concerned about the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Poland and in neighbouring Germany, Eric reached Port of Spain just ahead of Harry. Four years after Harry's death in 1942, Strasberg's mother, Wita, married Wolf Strasberg, a refugee from Bessarabia.

Strasberg remembers the war-time ration cards, but that was the extent of their hardship. "We had a pretty good life. Compared to Europe, we were very fortunate."

Anti-Semitism did not generally intrude into their lives, but Strasberg was exposed to a dose of anti-Jewish animus when he attended St. Mary's College, a Catholic institution with Hindu and Muslim students.

The community was Zionist-oriented. When Israel declared statehood in 1948, Strasberg and like-minded Jews paraded through the streets of Port of Spain in exultation. Later, a Jewish real estate developer with Israeli roots named three new streets – Theodor Herzl Street, Professor Chaim Weizman Avenue and Golda Meir Gardens – after Zionist luminaries.

Ackelsberg, 78, was born in Cieszyn, Poland. In 1942, Cieszyn's 4,000 Jews, including Ackelsberg and her parents, were rounded up by the Germans and removed to another location. She never saw her mother or father again.

During the next three years, Ackelsberg was sent to six different labour camps in Germany. In 1946, she joined an aunt in Ecuador, where she met her husband, William. Born in Stryj, Poland, he immigrated to Trinidad in 1938, and worked in construction. "At first, everything in Trinidad was strange," she recalled. "The people, the language. It took a while to get used to Trinidad. But it was our home."

For the majority of Jews, she explained, Trinidad was a "springboard" to perhaps a better, more intensely Jewish life abroad. "Parents programmed their children to leave Trinidad," said Strasberg. "They saw it as a steppingstone to America."

An Italian Jewish doctor and a local Chinese family encouraged Strasberg to study science and medicine at McGill University in Montreal. He left Port of Spain in 1957, never to return as a permanent resident. Strasberg's first wife, Paula Berger, was a Montrealer, and they had three children. In 1971, Strasberg moved to Hamilton, and in 1978, he established himself in Toronto.

"I never considered going back to Trinidad," said Strasberg, who maintains his connection with the island by regularly visiting his fathers' graves and by partaking of such Trinidadian culinary staples such as roti, callaloo, channah and coconut water.

Yufe, having sent her children Robert, Libby and Helen to Canadian schools, settled in Toronto after her husband took ill. Discombobulated by black power riots, her parents left Trinidad in 1970, settling in Florida. Ackelsberg and her late husband immigrated to Canada to join their daughter, Leah.

Only a handful of Jews, most in interfaith marriages, remain in Trinidad today. The rest have scattered to Canada, the United States, Venezuela, Israel, Britain and Australia.

This "lovely tropical oasis," as one Jewish resident described it in Our Calypso Shtetl, has turned a page in its history.

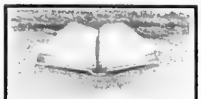
Tisha b'Av: a reminder of where we met God

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

The famed Argentine writer and essayist, Jorge Luis Borges, wrote a story titled Funes el memorioso (Funes the Memorious). It is the tale of an Argentine man, Ireneo Funes, who, as a result of a fall from a horse at the age of 19, found that he henceforth could forget absolutely nothing.



Rabbinic Reflections

He says in the story, "I have more memories in myself alone than all men have had since the world was a world."

Borges describes Funes' prodigious power of recall in these words: "We, in a glance, perceive three wine glasses on the table; Funes saw all the shoots, clusters and grapes of the vine… In effect, Funes remembered not only every leaf on every tree of every wood, but every one of the times he had perceived or imagined it. He determined to reduce all of his experiences to… recollections. which he would later define numerically. Two considerations dissuaded him: the thought that the task was interminable and the thought that it was useless."

It seems to me that it is possible to identify this character, Funes, with the Jewish people. After all, we are a people absorbed with memories and remembering. Our festivals and holy days all involve recalling our past and re-enacting those events and moments that formed and shaped us as a religious nation. Four times a year we recite the Yizkor prayers, memorializing family members no longer among the living and calling to mind those who sacrificed their lives for the sake of Judaism and the Jewish people.

Yet, I wonder if this identification is truly valid. Funes remembers every detail, every piece of information he has ever encountered and is understandably overwhelmed by it. He possesses no means of sifting through the memories to separate the insignificant detail from the recurring and powerful theme. How is such an individual comparable to us as Jews and to our memories?

This question is particularly apt as we commemorate the fast day of Tisha b'Av and recall the destruction of the temples in Jerusalem and all the suffering and vulnerability of the Jewish people in exile.

Why do Jews still fast today for an event that happened nearly 26 centuries ago? Why do we fast for a desolate and disgraced Jerusalem when that city is now in our hands and has been rebuilt and revived?

There are those among our people who, in light of the rebirth of our homeland in the State of Israel, object to this fast and to the period of semi-mourning that accompanies it. They feel, it appears, that observing Tisha b'Av today reflects the kind of memory Funes possessed: everything is remembered without the sifting of altered time and altered circumstances. Those recollections that, in this view, appear to be useless or inapplicable should be discarded and forgotten, and memory needs to be selective if we are to avoid the fate of Funes.

I respectfully differ with this point of view. We need not, like Funes, be "prisoners of memory," but it is an integral part of the Jewish mindset to cherish the glory and feel the pain of our past as if the events we recall happened to us, not only to our remote ancestors. This is the great power of the experience of the Passover seder. Many people today tend to be impatient with history, eager to forget something once it has passed. Jews, though, embrace history, even those aspects of it that are painful or embarrassing.

We should continue to observe the fast of Tisha b'Av as it serves as a reminder that history is, after all, where we met God and saw His purposes brought to fruition.

Prophetic ideas still relevant in our time

The Prophets*, by Norman Podhoretz, The Free Press, $47.50, October 2002.

Books
Bernard Baskin

They entered history dramatically and unexpectedly – and radically changed Jewish thought and expectations. The 15 literary prophets of the Hebrew Scriptures, beginning with Amos and ending with Malachai, flourished during the 300 year period between the mid-eighth and mid-fifth centuries BCE.

This time span was of crucial importance. It included the rise of three great empires, Assyria, Babylonia and Persia, as well as pivotal events in the life of the nation – the destruction of the Northern Kingdom by Assyria (722 BCE), the destruction of the Southern Kingdom and the Temple by the Babylonians (586 BCE), the Babylonian Exile and the early years of the Return to Zion with the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple.

The prophets came from many classes of society, including the aristocracy (Isaiah), the priesthood (Jeremiah and Ezekiel) and farming (Amos). They preached on the issues of the day and were fearless in the reproofs they administered to kings and priests, the rich and the powerful, the hostile masses. As a result, they were often persecuted and subjected to great hardships.

Despite the designation "prophet," these men were not fortune tellers or predictors of the future. Indeed, when it came to historical predictions other than general warnings that infidelity to God would lead to national catastrophe, they were often wrong. In their day, by their own testimony, they were often failures. Some of them were disregarded, some were laughed at, and some provoked popular resentment or official ire to the point of persecution and martyrdom. They were so far ahead of their listeners that they found only rare individuals who understood, appreciated and supported them.

Prophetic teaching covers many aspects of the Jewish ethic. It contains a rebuke to the sinner as well as the message of God's love, a burning nationalism and also a universalism and messianism, the threat of punishment as well as the promise of redemption. Above all is an insistence on the centrality of the one God. In general, all the prophets preached amidst idolatry, pagan immorality and social corruption. While each prophet spoke in his own style and with his own emphasis, to a significant extent the prophets displayed a marked unanimity in outlook.

Podhoretz, who served as editor of Commentary for more than 30 years and is well known as author and literary critic, is also a long-time student of the Hebrew Bible. In The Prophets, he has approached an old subject with new insights and emphases using a modern sensibility and awareness. He insists the classical prophets did not invent monotheism or carry it to a higher level than it had reached among their ancestors, that they did not elevate morality over ritual and that they did not constitute a party of the "spirit" in opposition to a rigidly legalistic, priestly "establishment." Above all, Podhoretz insists the prophets inveighed against self-deification, the delusion that human beings could become godly.

The precious and enduring legacy of the prophets – from moral grandeur to exalted poetry – is explored by the author with knowledge and emotion, as well as with telling reference to the problems of our own time.

Meaningful bar and bat mitzvahs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You probably don't have to think too hard to recall a garish over-the-top bar or bat mitzvah celebration that you've attended. But if that type of party is not for you and you want advice from b'nai mitzvah who have used the occasion to grow spiritually and even help others, you'll find it on the World Wide Web.

But first, the excess. If you really want to get an eyeful, check out the article "Bash Mitzvahs!" from New York Magazine [http://www.newyorkmetro.com/nymetro/urban/family/features/2343/]. Written in 1998 during the stock market boom, it catalogues quarter-million-dollar, multimedia, themed extravaganzas that were held at such venues as the Radio City Music Hall, Ellis Island and the Tavern on the Green. Were you thinking of doing something different and booking Natalie Cole for your simchah? You'll have to be more original than that. Natalie has already done a bar mitzvah on the aircraft carrier USS Intrepid. Her fee: $150,000 for 30 minutes.

At the other end of the spectrum, many sites emphasize that this coming of age is a perfect time to remember others. Alexandra Alper collected close to 900 toiletries from neighbours, dentists and supermarkets that she donated to a shelter for women. You can read Alexandra's and other b'nai mitzvah stories at Social Action.com [http://www.socialaction.com/barmitsva.html].

One of the best pages with ideas for bar or bat mitzvah kids is on the Ziv Tzedakah Fund Web site. Instead of telling kids how to make their celebrations meaningful, it starts by asking them to think about their talents and interests, what would they want to change in the world, whom they know to help get the job done, and finally asks them, "Why not?"

The site then gives examples of previous successful bar or bat mitzvah projects, a healthy reading list and great suggestions for what to do with party centerpieces when the party is over. (If you have traditional flower arrangements, break them up and deliver them to hospitals or nursing homes. If you have a sports-themed party, use a variety of sports equipment as centerpieces and then donate them to a local shelter where kids may not have their own equipment.) [http://www.ziv.org/BarBat.htm]

The author of the Mitzvah99 Web site says when he celebrated his bar mitzvah in March 1999, he tried to have both a fun and meaningful time. He doesn't tell us is his name. However, he has put together a very helpful site with suggestions for mitzvot you can do before, during and after your celebration. Congratula-tions, whoever you are! [http://members.aol.com/mitzvah99/mypage/]

Here is another intriguing way to mark a bar or bat mitzvah. The Jewish Foundation for the Righteous provides monthly financial support for more than 1,700 surviving Righteous Gentiles – people who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust. The foundation's bar/bat mitzvah program matches a young person with a Christian rescuer [http://www.jfr.org/programs/bbprogram.html].

Another popular way to celebrate a bar or bat mitzvah is through a family visit to Israel. The Jerusalem Post reports that before the year 2000, more than 2,000 pre-teens – 94 per cent of them from the United States or Canada – came to Israel to celebrate their special day. Travel planners are quite sophisticated and offer extended through the dried riverbeds of the Negev desert [http://makeashorterlink.com/?V4B823B63]. But the most popular spots for the actual ceremony remain quite traditional: Jerusalem and Masada. You can follow along a picture album of one bar mitzvah boy's trip and lovely shots of his ceremony at the Kotel [http://www.chez.com/purplemike/jeudi1.htm].

Emuna Braverman was in the throes of preparing her son's bar mitzvah ("attractive but not ostentatious, joyful but not wild, the food delicious but not extravagant") when she wrote about what she hopes her son will take away from the experience [http://www.aish.com/family/heart/My_Sons_Bar_Mitzvah.asp]: "Of course the bar mitzvah boy must give charity from his gifts… But more important than these grand gestures are the daily acts of caring and honor and respect for others… It's being patient in line, it's being respectful to teachers, it's sharing with sisters (yes, even sisters!) that truly make the man."

Judaism relevant in the modern world

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Although there was a time when Jews were confined to ghettos, that was never the case for Judaism itself. Imbued with both a particular and a universal message, Judaism has always proved itself a unique cultural critic, able to offer a sharp perspective on passing events.

As of this writing, star basketball player Kobe Bryant has been charged with felony sexual assault. Bryant's fame and his marriage and recent fatherhood have lent his confessed adultery the yellowed air of tattling and scandal. Whether his sins extend beyond the moral is for the courts to decide.

The tawdriness of the situation expands when one considers the almost predictable invasion of privacy of the alleged victim, whose name, address and photograph have already shown up on some Web sites. Does the Torah have anything to say on such matters and are they important issues in a Jewish studies classroom? I would argue that the answer is an emphatic yes to both questions.

It is not Bryant or his accuser that is of central concern to Jewish education, but the ramifications of a cultural obsession with celebrity and the public's perverse disappointment in realizing that athletes or movie stars are not paragons of virtue. Cases like these end up garnering more ink than they deserve – obviously an ironic statement given the context of this column – precisely because of our penchant for initially elevating such figures all out of proportion because they happen to be able to put a ball through a hoop or a puck in a net.

But such incidents can provide valuable contexts for the classroom. They allow us to perceive what we value, and what inexorably emerges is the disease called gossip that so dominates western life.

Deriving from an Anglo-Saxon compound meaning "godfather," gossip evolved in the Middle Ages to describe something roughly akin to close friend. How does this relate to our present day usage? Possibly our gossiping implies familiarity or intimacy with a subject, as if we were talking about people we know and things close to us. Strangers on TV screens now become dinner table acquaintances, and we fill up our own inner boredom with the illusory images and fragments of other lives.

The Torah's laws on gossip and the need to maintain confidentiality are detailed and all-encompassing. They are one of the ethical centres of Judaism and are unrelenting in their condemnation of any betrayal of confidence or trampling of the boundaries of privacy. There are no excuses available for making other people's activities the core of our conversations, whether to denigrate them or even to overly praise them (the better to not breed envy and hence a reflexive derision in our listeners).

With so much talk in modernity of religion's supposed irrelevance, and its having been trumped by technology and "liberations" of every type, it only takes a brief glance at a newspaper and the subsequent cultural frenzy at the latest passing sensationalism to recognize the wisdom of Judaism. In the words of former U.S. president John Adams, "the Hebrews have done more to civilize men than any other nation," an idea whose time is always now.

JVS Entrepreneur of the Year runs niche singles sites

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The man who founded ChristianCafe.com and its spinoff, JewishCafe.com – now the third-highest traffic Jewish singles site on the Internet, according to Alexa.com, a third-party ranking service – was honoured as JVS Toronto's Entrepreneur of the Year at its first annual Strictly Business luncheon early last month.

Sam Moorcroft, a 37-year-old MBA, was downsized five years ago from a software company, six months after moving here from Vancouver and starting a new job as a project manager. Searching for employment on the Internet – and unattached at the time – he found himself straying to Web sites for Christian singles, looking to meet women with a similar background to his own.

After about two months, he suggested to his brother Philip – who along with 18 other people had been downsized from the same company – that they start an online business together.

"Finally a friend of ours said, 'You're always complaining that these sites aren't as good as you could do. Why don't you do a better job?' " recalled Sam Moorcroft in his comfortable office in Markham.

To get started, he enrolled in the Self-Employment Assistance (SEA) program at JVS Toronto, after reading about it in a newspaper article.

The program, which is supported by Human Resources Development Canada and supervised by Social Enterprise Development Innovations, teaches entrepreneurial skills and matches participants with a business adviser. Participants also receive extended employment insurance benefits.

Philip Moorcroft went to work as a financial analyst, and became Sam's silent partner, funding the new entreprise.

From its early days when Moorcroft worked solo in his rented basement apartment, the company has grown to a $3- million dollar business, with 13 employees working in a recently redecorated 2,000-square-foot office. Since 2001, its annual revenues have doubled, a modest increase compared to its 1,100 per cent growth rate in its first two years.

Moorcroft is long gone from the basement apartment and now owns his own home on a 10-acre property north of Toronto. In 2002, RealCafes.com, the parent company, was named Canada's tenth-hottest start-up company by Profit Magazine.

When he was getting started, Moorcroft set out to create a warm, cozy "esthetic." He liked the idea of a virtual cafe. "Where do you meet for the first time in the real world?" he mused. "Women want to feel safe, and men don't want to spring for a big dinner."

Within a year of starting, Moorcroft was covering his costs, but along the way he ran up $100,000 in debt and ended up taking contract work in the summer to fund the business. Failure was never an option, he said.

Buoyed by his success in the Christian singles market – ChristianCafe marked its first client marriage three months after it began – Moorcroft decided it was time to think about other markets. A brief foray into the generic singles market failed, but served as a learning experience, he said.

Last year he hired Aliza Schneid, 25 – who had majored in Jewish studies and economics at the University of Toronto, where she was active in Hillel – to run JewishCafe.com.

According to Moorcroft, Schneid "eats, breathes and sleeps" her work.

"Bringing Jewish singles together is something I believe in," she said.

Fourteen months into its existence, the Jewish site has 10,000 to 15,000 active clients at any given time, with 100 to 150 new sign-ups on a good day, said Moorcroft. The Christian site has about 60,000 clients, with about 500 new ones a day, he said. Membership costs $24.95 (US) a month or $99 a year, following 14 days of free access for JewishCafe (seven days for its Christian counterpart). Most clients are American, with about 2,000 Canadians and 5,000 Israelis on the Jewish site.

Starting an online business takes a lot of research, a lot of money, and good customer service, said Moorcroft.

Timing is also a factor. One of the biggest boosts to his business, he believes, was the release of the 1998 movie You've Got Mail, a tale of online romance.

Moorcroft is now thinking about expanding into the East Indian singles market. This year, however, the company is financing Philip's consulting firm. Both companies are co-owned by the two brothers.

Judge rejects Zundel's defence

The judge presiding over Ernst Zundel's detention review hearing last week said he did not believe Zundel's claim that he has no control over his controversial Web site.

"I don't really believe what you say," said Justice Pierre Blais during the Holocaust denier's testimony last Tuesday, the National Post reported.

Zundel claimed his wife Ingrid Rimland, whom he described as "a very forceful lady," maintains full control of the Zundelsite from her home in Tennessee.

Zundel said he doesn't even see the material on the site, as he is computer illiterate.

Donald MacIntosh, the lead federal lawyer representing the government, said he finds it hard to believe that Zundel, a self-described egotist, would allow someone else to run the site, which contains a lot of anti-Semitic material.

"Given that you claim to be a gift to this world and have a tremendous ego, you would be consulted on a regular basis as to the materials that appear on the Zundelsite," MacIntosh told Zundel.

In an effort to link Zundel to the site, MacIntosh pointed out that he had paid his wife $3,000 a month to work for him, Canadian Press reported.

Zundel replied that the work had nothing to do with the Web site, which was created five years before the couple were married.

In 2000, the Canadian Human Rights Commission ruled that anti-Semitic material must be taken off of the Zundelsite. Zundel fled to the United States shortly afterward.

Zundel has been detained here since February, when he was deported from the United States to Canada for overstaying his visitor's Visa.

Upon his arrival, Canadian immigration officials issued a security certificate deeming Zundel a threat to national security.

The Federal Court is reviewing the certificate. If the judge rules it is reasonable, Zundel will be thrown out of the country.

The Canadian government plans to deport Zundel to his native Germany, where he faces charges of inciting hatred.

Ryerson course to examine Jews in film and TV

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

Have you ever wondered why the Jews who created Hollywood left Judaism out of their universalized, cinematic worldview? Or why TV producers bother making explicit the religion of sitcom characters such as Jerry Seinfeld, Friends' Monica and Ross, and countless others, when Judaism does not at all inform their TV existences?

Judaism often ignored

These are some of the issues that will be addressed in a new continuing education course being offered at Ryerson University this fall. Conceived by distinguished film writer and programmer Shlomo Schwartzberg, "The Image of the Jew in Film and Television: Realities and Fantasies" will survey over a century of the relationship between Jews and their representation in the arts.

"I'll examine the portrayals, stereotypes, both positive and negative, and perceptions that Jews have been subjected to, from the early days of Hollywood and the beginning days of television up to the present day," says Schwartzberg, who adds that it's designed for anyone interested in how Jews have been portrayed on the big and small screens.

The course will focus on Jews both behind the scenes and in front of the camera, mostly in the United States but with selected emphasis on Canada and England where applicable.

Schwartzberg says classes will get underway with a discussion of the early immigrant Hollywood moguls, who, concerned about how Jews would be viewed and depicted, decided to take control of the industry themselves. The result was "a de-emphasis and even outright denial of what it means to be Jewish," says Schwartzberg.

Film and television have evolved and become more diversified over the decades, and so have ideas about visually represented Jewishness.

"Today things are much more complicated in terms of the depiction of Jews by Jewish writers and directors and actors."

This is where the idea for the course came in.

Schwartzberg's abundant enthusiasm for the issues that will form the basis of his classes reflect the insight of someone who has long contemplated the many intricacies of the subject.

"Cinematically, there are so many Jewish portrayals emerging on screen but other American Jewish realities – the search for spiritual meaning in life, the complex American Jewish relationship to Israel – are completely absent in Hollywood," he observes.

For Schwartzberg, teaching is very much a logical next step in a career largely defined

Courteney Cox Arquette
as Monica on Friends

by a passion for film and the arts. For nearly two decades, he has worked as an arts and entertainment reporter, film critic and Canadian film correspondent for publications ranging from the North York Mirror, California's Box Office magazine and Toronto's Festival magazine, to the English trade publication Moving Pictures and the English language Israeli newsmagazine, The Jerusalem Report.

When he was 17, he became what he calls a "fanatic", when films by such masters as German filmmaker Rainer Werner Fassbinder (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant) and Robert Altman (Nashville) played at Montreal's repertory cinemas. Hollywood films, of course, were also a mainstay.

"In those days we lined up to get into the opening night premiere of the latest James Bond adventure. But I also remember reading an article in a Jewish publication that asked the question, analyzing the old cop show Starsky and Hutch, as to why there were relatively few Jewish depictions on the tube, even though the actors were often Jewish themselves," says Schwartzberg.

Thoughts like those stayed with him as his career got underway, and he was delighted when he had the opportunity to speak with Brian Damude, head of the school of Image Arts at Ryerson University, to pitch his idea for the course.

Highlights of films and television shows that will be examined include 1927's The Jazz Singer, The Goldbergs and Seinfeld, Diner and Slums of Beverly Hills, Marjorie Morningstar and Kissing Jessica Stein, as well as The Pawnbroker and The Sopranos.

While teaching is, as he puts it, "a natural outgrowth of my interest in film and Jewish artistic representation," Schwartzberg has also, in the past few years, been giving hour-long lectures on the subject to synagogue groups and Hadassah chapters. He has also been giving informative and probing talks about the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, for which he has been programming a cross-section of international Jewish films for eight years.

Schwartzberg considers this course as an expansion of the work he's already been doing. "I'm like a stand up comic who's been honing his act before taking it to the big comedy club: Ryerson."

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED: The Jews for Jesus missionary organization is poised to target the Toronto Jewish community for three weeks this summer, beginning August 25, with "Behold Your God" – their most intensive and aggressive evangelistic crusade ever. They will use the media, billboards and a street campaign to flood our city with conversionary tracts directed toward Jews.
In response to this threat, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafletting campaign to alert and educate the public. We are seeking to train volunteers for our counter-missionary "Rapid Response Unit." JEWS FOR JUDAISM is seeking volunteers who will act as "Spotters" – who will notify us where and when the missionaries appear, or as "Counter-Leafletters" – who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner on the street beside the missionaries.
This campaign is scheduled to hit Toronto from Aug. 25 – Sept. 14. Montreal and Vancouver are slated for 2004 - 2005. If you would like to volunteer in our program and/or help support our vital work, please contact JEWS FOR JUDAISM.
You'll be outraged by their plans!

Asper belittles road map to peace; calls on Israel to withdraw from it

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian media magnate Israel Asper has belittled the internationally sponsored road map peace plan as a "replay" of the ill-fated Oslo process, and urged Israel to withdraw from it.

In a speech last week to mark the 63rd anniversary of the death of Zionist Revisionist leader Vladimir (Ze'ev) Jabotinsky, a man he called a great leader, Asper said that "all people of goodwill" hope the road map will succeed.

But Asper, the Winnipeg-based chair of CanWest Global Communications and publisher of the National Post, cast aspersions on it.

"One is tempted to conclude that the road map is a snare and a delusion, just as was Oslo," he said before a full house at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue. "If that is correct, then the war will continue until there is a clear victor and a vanquished."

Asper, who spoke under the auspices of Herut-Likud and B'nai Brith Canada, expressed doubt as to whether the three-part road map, which calls for a two-state solution and security guarantees for Israel, will advance past its first phase.

He said Israel is entitled " to call a halt to its obligations" under the road map because of Palestinian non-compliance.

The Palestinian Authority, he argued, has neither brought an end to anti-Israel incitement nor tried to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism.

He said the PA is strong enough to wipe out groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad, but Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, whom he described as "a known Holocaust denier," refuses to do that and has ruled it out even as a possibility.

"That is why the road map has become a farce in phase 1. It appears that the Palestinians want a peace process, but not peace. This is nothing but a replay of the ill-conceived Oslo process."

Commenting on Oslo, Asper observed, "Israel delivered to the Arabs everything that it promised, but the Arabs did not keep a single one of the commitments they had made. Terrorism continued [and] the incitement to violence and hatred continued in the Palestinian schools, mosques, media and political rhetoric."

Asper had harsh words for the Israeli leaders who signed what he dismissed as the "Oslo fiasco/disaster."

"The Palestinian Authority, under the hallucinogenic naivete of Israel's then leaders, was permitted to arm 30,000 Palestinians with Israeli ordnance in order to force Palestinian terrorists to keep the peace."

And at the 2000 Camp David summit, he said, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Barak, "made an egregious offer, giving the Palestinians almost everything they outrageously demanded."

Asper claimed that the hudna, the current ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians, is worthless.

"The terrorism continues daily, with token abatement only. The hudna is being used to give [Palestinian] fighters a summer vacation while they rest, rearm, recruit and recover from the devastating blows that have been inflicted on them by Israel."

Citing an Israeli intelligence report, Asper said the Palestinians are currently building 1,000 Qassem rockets with materials smuggled through tunnels from Egypt to the Gaza Strip.

"Since the alleged ceasefire was declared," he added, "there have been 85 rocket attacks from Gaza alone."

And Israel has blocked 12 suicide bombings attempts.

Suggesting that a new Palestinian state will be a "terrorist state," Asper came out against the formation of such an entity.

He said the Palestinians must fulfil several conditions before they attain statehood.

"There [must be] a complete policy change in the Palestinian and Arab world's attitude both toward Jews and Israel, as well as to the United States. There is regrettably no evidence of that."

If a Palestinian state should arise, it should be "a protectorate" of Israel, "with Israeli control over the education system, foreign affairs, immigration [and] defence."

Israel Asper

And such a state cannot be permitted to enter into mutual defence treaties with other countries, he noted.

Asper called the current Palestinian demand for a mass prisoner release and a stoppage of construction of Israel's security fence along the West Bank misleading.

"The road map is about none of these. In fact, none of these matters are even part of the road map. They are merely red herrings dragged across the picture by the Palestinians to try to distract the world from the fact they they are not carrying out their commitments."

In a brief survey of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Asper said the dispute is not really about final borders, settlements, refugees or Jerusalem.

"This 100-year war is about the right of the Jewish nation to have a sovereign state, which is a Jewish state, within the boundaries of the biblical and ancestral homeland of its forebears."

He claimed that the fundamental goal of the "Arab leadership" is to destroy Israel and kill or expel all Jews.

"This is not an assumption that I postulate. It is taken from the mouths of all the principal leaders of the Arab world, down through the ages, including right up to and including much of the present leadership."

The Palestinian strategy is clear, he said. "It is to fight for and take everything and anything they can get." Once they have achieved these objectives, they will demand yet more, until they destroy Israel and expunge the Jews from historic Palestine. "And they don't care how many generations it will take."

Asper said his pessimism about the future of the road map stems in part from the fact that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat still wields power.

"The road map is premised on regime change in the governance of the Palestinians. That simply has not happened. Arafat, the master terrorist, still runs the show."

He acknowledged that Israel, in the interests of preserving its relationship with the United States, has no alternative but to pay lip service to the road map, "to continue playing the game until President [George W.] Bush finally realizes that he has been snookered."

In closing, Asper demanded a complete review of Canada's Mideast policy, saying that its United Nations voting record on Israel is "unacceptable."

In addition, he said, Canada should not grant a broadcasting licence to the Al-Jazeera cable television station, should ensure that Jewish refugees driven out of the Arab world will be fairly compensated, and should demand that Israel be treated "as a full-fledged member of the United Nations."

Key road map condition ignored by media

In the period leading up to Ariel Sharon's July 28 meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush, important media outlets have focused on a Palestinian demand that is not part of the road map peace plan, ignoring an essential condition that is.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Palestinian demand for a massive release of prisoners held by Israel is contained in the Palestinian hudna (ceasefire agreement) to which Israel is not a party. Some reporters and commentators don't seem to realize that there is no such stipulation in the road map leading to the resumption of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. Meanwhile, an essential condition of the road map, that Palestinian terrorists groups be disarmed and disbanded, has been all but forgotten.

On July 20, BBC News announced that "Israel sees the prisoner release as a goodwill gesture designed to strengthen the position of the Palestinian prime minister, known as Abu Mazen, rather than an obligation under the internationally backed peace plan – the road map."

This, of course, is not a matter of what Israel thinks but rather what is, or is not, actually in the road map. For many years, the BBC has proven itself hostile toward Israel. It earned an official Israeli cold-shoulder for a grossly one-sided documentary on Israeli nuclear policy titled Israel's Secret Weapon, which was broadcast in March, and it recently ran afoul of its own government over the David Kelly affair, in which it used a United Nations arms inspector as a source for a story that accused the British government of altering intelligence reports to justify the war in Iraq. (It is believed Kelly killed himself after being interrogated by the government over the story.)

Now the BBC has violated elemental journalist ethics by failing to get a basic fact straight. One cannot help but suspect the error was not simply the result of inattention or laziness.

If the BBC were confined solely to Britain that would be one thing. However, its World Service is widely viewed on CBC's Newsworld and is also seen, according to Toronto Star columnist Richard Gwyn, by approximately four million Americans daily (Toronto Star, July 23).

Even the usually reliable Mike Hornbrook of CBC Radio faltered when he reported (World Report, July 25) without clarification that "Abbas made clear that it's time for Israel to start fulfilling its obligations under the so-called road map to peace. He's demanding the Israelis release significant number of Palestinian prisoners."

There have been some noticeable exceptions to this trend. Greg Myre of the New York Times reported on July 27 that "the peace plan does not specifically require Israel to release any of the roughly 6,000 Palestinian prisoners it is holding. Mr. Abbas [the Palestinian prime minister], however, has made it a priority."

And the Economist wrote in its July 26 edition: "A stormy meeting between Mahmoud Abbas and Ariel Sharon on July 20… was over Israel's failure to release a decent number of Palestinian prisoners. Though their release is not a specific demand of the road map, it is crucial to confidence-building – and to enabling the Palestinian prime minister to keep his unruly factions to the three-month ceasefire they reluctantly agreed to on June 29th."

Nonetheless, in the same issue, the Economist (which, in a classic British understatement, called the BBC's conduct "less than impeccable") made the less-than-impeccable observation that the 5,000 or so Palestinians held by Israel are "political prisoners." The words "terrorists" and "murderers" are nowhere to be found.

The media would serve the interest of accuracy by turning attention to the central demand of the road map. As Yoel Marcus wrote in Ha'aretz July 29, "The disbanding of the terrorist organizations is the first operational clause of the road map and a prerequisite for its continuation."

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

THE PLAY'S THE THING: More than 800 people turned out at the Isabel Bader Theatre to watch USDS and Act One Productions' recent performances of Guys & Dolls, featuring parents of students at each of the three campuses. The production, directed by Alex Moses, raised $10,000 to support the Above & Beyond Excellence Fund, and proceeds will specifically benefit the arts in education program at USDS.

Klarsfeld has fought to bring Nazis to justice

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Over the last two years, anti-Semitism has been increasing in France. A Judeophobia that was formerly suppressed is now out in the open. And it is sometimes violent.

Serge Klarsfeld, historian, well-known lawyer, and president of the Association des Fils et des Filles des Déportés juifs de France, is a pre-eminent member of the Jewish community of France. A militant, Klarsfeld, with his wife Beatte, has dedicated his life to bringing to justice the worst Nazi criminals and their accomplices.

Klarsfeld recently spoke to The Canadian Jewish News about the difficult, tense circumstances under which the Jews of France are currently living.

Canadian Jewish News: Since the beginning of the second intifadah in the fall of 2000, anti-Semitism has been increasing at an alarming rate in France. One hideous form that Judeophobia has taken is the denunciation by pro-Palestinian students of teaching about the Holocaust in the secondary schools. Are we witnessing a trivialization of the Shoah in France today?

Serge Klarsfeld: I don't think there is a systematic effort in France to trivialize the Shoah. It is true that there have recently been some incidents in secondary schools on the outskirts of Paris where Arab pro-Palestinian students from North Africa were offended when the topic of the genocide of Jews during World War II was raised in class. But I believe that these were fairly isolated incidents. The Association des Fils et Filles des Déportés juifs de France last year showed a major exhibition in the train stations of France depicting French Jewish children who were deported and killed in the Nazi death camps. In a year of exhibition, there was only one anti-Semitic incident.

In February, I took 140 young, non-Jewish Lyon high school students to Auschwitz. The Shoah is not being trivialized in any way in French society. But it is true that this pernicious phenomenon is raging among some minority fringe elements in the North African French Muslim community, who are violently anti-Israel.

CJN: Does this violent Judeophobia have a destructive effect on French society?

Klarsfeld: Yes. The virulent anti-Zionism of the French Muslims, communists and leftists has, in the long run, had a pernicious effect, especially on the media. Many French and European journalists have been affected by this Israel phobia. It is very difficult to combat the phenomenon. Every time someone accuses critics of Israel of being bogged down in anti-Semitism, they respond that they are not anti-Jewish, but merely anti-Zionist. At one time, they burned Jews because of their religion and no one wanted any more Jews in European society. Now, they revile and kill Jews because they are citizens of a Jewish state.

It is obvious that we are facing a kind of illness, one that is incomprehensible, but explicable. There are about 15 million Jews in the world, one billion Muslims and 1.5 billion Christians. The Jews, with a state, a religion and a Jewish culture are now, in a sense, equal to the two other huge blocs. But these blocs have never liked minorities. They act like the big kids in the school playground. They beat up the little ones.

CJN: The French and the Europeans are increasingly pro-Palestinian and critical of Israel. Does this harsh reality bother you?

Klarsfeld: You have to realize that after having known the horrible slaughter of World War II, the French, like the Germans and other Europeans, have known peace for 55 years. These people now enjoy a socio-economic prosperity that Europe has not known for centuries. These nations want to continue to profit from all this. The Mideastern conflict exasperates them because they have the impression that they are in danger of losing everything they have gained in the last few decades. They are therefore ready to sacrifice the State of Israel, just as during the last great war, when many nations were also ready to sacrifice the Jews because it was the obsession of the Nazis. Now it is not only the Nazis but the Arabs who want to sacrifice Israel. It is no longer, as it was in the '30s and '40s, the place of Jews in European societies that is being questioned. To-day, it is the existence of a sovereign Jewish state that is bothering many Europeans.

CJN: In France, even in political and diplomatic circles, the idea that the State of Israel might one day disappear is being mentioned openly.

Klarsfeld: That is not the official position of the French government, but it is true that one can sense an annoyance in France because the Jewish state will not bow down, and it is allied with the United States. There are many in France, particularly in the diplomatic circles of the government, who have great difficulty in understanding and admitting that Israel is a tiny state that could be compared to a ghetto. In fact, if a Saddam Hussein or a Muammar Khadafi dropped a bomb on Tel Aviv, it would virtually destroy Israel. Huge threats are currently weighing down the Jewish state.

Many Europeans certainly wish Israel would disappear from the map of the Middle East. In their eyes, the existence of a Jewish state is one factor in war. They believe that if Israel disappeared, even if the Israelis themselves did not disappear, it would not be a terrible loss for humanity because it would enable the Muslim and Christian worlds to live together more easily. This false analysis is a huge error. But it is in keeping with their relationship. We will see what the future has in store for Israel and the Jewish people.

The Jewish community of France does its best to help Israel politically. The Conseil Représentatif des Institutions juives de France – the official representative of French Judaism – and its president, Roger Cuckierman, do not hesitate to stand firm in their defence of Israel's rights and interests. They are often severely criticized for this. But above all, we must not bend. On the contrary, we must continue to show solidarity with the state and the people of Israel.

CJN: Is there a crisis between the Jewish community in France and the powers that be?

Klarsfeld: Yes. Today there is a lack of confidence, a kind of divorce between many members of the Jewish community and the people in power. Those who are most upset and critical of the French government are the Sephardim of North African origin. They have great difficulty in accepting the situation because when they lived in North Africa, the Arabs also considered them second-class citizens.

Speedy recipes for stressed-out mommies, daddies

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
CJN Staff

It's a familiar weeknight scenario for many modern households.

As one of two working spouses, you defy speed traps as you race from work to pick up kids at day-care or after-school programs, only to arrive home at 5:30 or later with one or more cranky youngsters who want food – NOW!

Unfortunately, the nanny you couldn't afford – or perhaps were too uncomfortable to hire – doesn't have dinner waiting at home, and your supply of frozen ready-made or pre-cooked delicacies has long since been exhausted.

Forget those gourmet meals you and your spouse used to make before you had children, when you thought of yourselves as sophisticated foodies. You need to put something your kids like to eat on the table within 30 minutes of arrival or cannibalism will become an all-too-real possibility. (That, or a nervous breakdown for the grown-up in the picture.)

What's a harried mommy or daddy to do?

At our place, to prevent mealtimes from becoming too crazy, and to make sure our boys, ages five and two, don't fill up on pre-dinner "tide me over so I don't throw a tantrum" snacks, my wife and I often prepare the next day's supper after the kids are asleep.

But because we don't want to spend every evening doing chores until midnight – and you can't leave all the laundry for Sunday – working moms and dads like us need some kid-tested favourites we can throw together in half an hour or less.

The following are some workhorse standbys that can be made amid the daily chaos – and definitely don't require a diploma from Le Cordon Bleu.

CHILI BEAN TACOS

Thank God for this one. Its vegetarian combination of beans and cheese provides a complete protein, similar to meat or fish, which supplies all the essential amino acids for muscles, bones, teeth and other growing body parts. Our five-year-old eats at least two whenever we have them, and even the two-year-old is beginning to come around, now that he can actually chew the crunchy shells. And not only are they tasty, kids can help put together the ingredients just before they eat them – a big selling point with "all by myself" toddlers or kindergartners. Another cool thing about this recipe is that the amount of tomatoes and spices can be easily modified to suit your kids' tastes.

We need some kid-tested favourites we can throw together in half an hour or less

14 oz. can of red kidney beans, drained and rinsed
2 large tomatoes or half a 28 oz. can of tomatoes, chopped
8-10 taco shells
4 romaine lettuce leaves, shredded
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1 tbsp. chili powder or chili sauce
grated cheddar cheese

Place kidney beans, tomatoes, cumin and chili sauce or powder in a sauce pan and cook over medium heat until heated through or until a bit sludgy (whichever way you prefer taco filling). Place shells on a cookie sheet and heat at 350 for five minutes, or microwave four shells for 30 seconds on high (keep in mind that microwave power levels vary). Fill the shells with the bean mixture, top with cheese and lettuce – or, better yet, let the kids do it – and watch as they're eaten by the hungry hordes. Serves four.

SOLE FINGERS

This winning recipe is both incredibly straightforward and extremely tasty. It's a slightly modified version of a recipe in Better Food For Kids, a cookbook put out by Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and written by two of its dieticians, Joanna Saab and Dana Kalnins. It's full of easy recipes for kids, as well as nutrition tips for parents who might be worried their picky eaters aren't getting enough essential nutrients. This sole recipe is more popular at our house than commercially prepared breaded fish, and without the unhealthy trans fats in the form of hydrogenated oils and shortenings. Serve it with rice or potato and any dip you like.

½ cup bread crumbs
¼ cup grated parmesan cheese
14 oz. frozen sole fillets, thawed and cut into strips
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. butter or margarine

In a bowl, combine bread crumbs and parmesan and mix well. Dredge fish strips in crumbs to coat well and transfer to a plate. In a skillet, heat half the oil and half the butter over medium heat. In batches, adding more oil and butter/margarine to each, add fish and cook for five minutes on one side. Turn over and cook for two more minutes or until browned. Serves four.

CURLY NOODLE DINNER

Working mom Joanna Stavksy, wife of CJN staffer Michael Stavsky, modified this recipe from one in Evelyn Raab's cookbook, Clueless in the Kitchen: A Cookbook for Teens. (Hey, you take what you can from where you can!) Total prep and cook time is about 15 minutes, she says, provided you remember to take the ground meat out of the freezer the night before.

"It's so fast and easy, you hardly need to think about it," Stavsky says. "I started using it shortly after Michael and I got married, largely because I was too lazy to make anything complicated, but now, with a 2½-year-old underfoot after work, speed is essential."

She says her little guy Yitzy loves this recipe "because, like all kids, I think, he's a big noodle fan. His favourite part is slurping up the noodles as loudly as possible. He is a fairly picky eater, and we occasionally have to resort to cream cheese sandwiches when he turns up his nose at what we're having for dinner, but he really enjoys this meal in spite of it having sauce on it and tomatoes – gasp, a vegetable – in it.

"The original recipe contained a can of corn niblets, which I omit because Yitzy would insist I pick them all out."

1 lb. ground chicken, ground beef or ground turkey (whatever you've got – it works equally well with all three)
2 packages ramen-type noodles
1 28 oz. can of diced tomatoes
⅓ can (see above) of water
(1 can corn niblets, if desired)

Put the two blocks of noodles in a see-through sealable plastic bag and squeeze the air out. Leave a tiny corner open. Give bag to a reliable toddler or preschooler and let him or her bang on it to break up the noodles. He or she can do this job while you move on to step two. (Just watch to make sure the noodles aren't crushed to dust.)

In a large dutch oven (or a skillet, but a big pot minimizes the splatter), cook the ground meat until done. Drain off fat. Pour all the seasoning from one soup packet, and half of the second, onto the meat. Pour in the entire can of tomatoes, juice included, then fill can about ⅓ of the way with water and add that as well. Stir and bring to a boil. Add noodles and stir to submerge. Reduce heat to low, cover the pot and cook for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Serves three to four.

TUNA CASSEROLE

This version of the time-tested classic takes a bit longer than 30 minutes (more like 45), but Lisa Gonsalves, policy adviser to both the chair and the chief administrative officer of York Region, says her kids Mason, 4, and Austin, 6, love it.

"It's quick, requires very few ingredients and above all is very nutritious," says Gonsalves, whose husband Nigel is director of marketing and operations for a firm that distributes vegetable oil to restaurants.

"After I had kids, I soon realized it was very difficult to work full time and still have enough time to prepare fresh meals every day and be able to take the kids to activities," she says.

"When I was a kid, my family often ate casseroles, and tuna casserole was a regular. Frankly, I didn't have a clue how to make it, so my mother gave me this recipe and it has proven to be a hit. Austin and Mason love pasta and are also fond of tuna, so the combination is just right."

1½ cup dry macaroni
1 can tuna
1 can (10 oz.) condensed cream of mushroom soup
1 can mushrooms (optional)
½ medium onion, minced
⅓ cup of milk
grated parmesan cheese, cheddar cheese or whatever

Cook and drain macaroni. Heat soup with milk, onion and a dash of salt and pepper. Mix macaroni with soup mixture. Add mushrooms. Drain and break up tuna and mix together. Pour into a greased casserole dish. Sprinkle generously with grated parmesan, cheddar cheese, parsley flakes, cracker or bread crumbs – whatever. Bake at 350 for 25 to 30 minutes uncovered.

Note: You can also add frozen vegetables (peas are great) or chopped green pepper for some colour.

Hint: Macaroni can be cooked in the microwave – it's a lot faster and less messy. Just put it in a glass bowl with about 1¾ cups of water and cook on high for about 9 or 10 minutes, stirring every 3 minutes or so.

Gelcer remembered as a master storyteller

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Alec Gelcer, who died recently at age 66 after a seven-month battle with brain cancer, wanted to be remembered for the stories he told.

Obituary

Known to many in storytelling circles in the Jewish and non-Jewish community, Gelcer hosted storytelling programs at Congregation Habonim and the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre.

He was also a featured speaker at the 1001 Storytelling Nights, a weekly gathering of storytellers and listeners, and along with Eli Rubinstein, co-wrote a storytelling column for The Canadian Jewish News several years ago.

Gelcer was a frequent guest on the CBC, as well as in the United States and his native South Africa. His most recent radio appearance was for a special BBC broadcast from the Statue of Liberty in New York.

He was also a guest speaker at a number of UJA Federation and United Israel Appeal programs.

Rubenstein, who calls Gelcer his friend, teacher and mentor, said that on the first night of Shavuot, "Alec insisted on attending the storytelling program at Habonim, despite the advance stage of his illness.

"That night, Alec told a number of stories lying on a cot. Despite his weakness, he was his usual eloquent and profound self, and all who were present witnessed an act of incredible courage and dedication."

Shirley, his wife of about 20 years, said she is amazed at the number of people who have been affected by his stories.

"People, some who only knew him through his storytelling, told me at the shivah that his stories have changed their lives. [Alec] was a graduate of psychology and had worked as a therapist, but storytelling was his passion.

"He told stories throughout his life, but he never thought of it professionally until about 15 years ago," she said.

Simcha Jacobovici, founder and former president of the Riverdale Shul, which Gelcer attended regularly, said Gelcer often organized storytelling for children at the shul.

"Alec was one of those rare people who stood out in a room. The highlight of coming to shul for me and my family on Shabbat was the drashot Alec used to give.

"They grew deeper over the years as he became more immersed in Judaism. He dignified our shul by his presence... He was always looking to do the right thing; he was always searching for the truth, and if you could demonstrate that something was true, he would listen carefully," Jacobovici said.

Alec and Shirley Gelcer

Echoing a chassidic story, his son Jim said at the funeral that "we will continue to tell Alec's stories, and in that, find some comfort and redemption."

In addition to his wife and son Jim, Gelcer leaves his son Alon, his daughter-in-law Lori, his stepchildren Lovell and David Kibel, his sisters Dorothy Gutter and Rosalyn Gelcer, his brother-in-law Pinchas Gutter and his grandchildren Jacob, Kai, Mira, Lila and Emma.

Couple speaks out at World Infertility Month

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

We have all heard the supposed reasons for a couple not being able to get pregnant: it's the woman's fault, it's all in your head or, relax and don't worry about it.

And how about the old saying that if you take fertility drugs, you will definitely have multiple births.

These are all myths.

A fact sheet issued in June for World Infertility Month by the Infertility Awareness Association of Canada said that female factors account for about 45 per cent of infertility cases, male for about 40 per cent, (these figures include situations where each of the pair bears some responsibility) and the rest are simply unexplained.

What does have a bearing on fertility is the quality of the egg, which often is associated with increasing age. Al Yuzpe, co-director of the Genesis Fertility Centre in Vancouver, and chair of the in-vitro fertilization directors committee of the Canadian Fertility and Andrology Society, said at a press conference that "the chance of conception begins to decrease between ages 30 and 35."

By age 40, he said, a woman's chance of conception is less than half of what it was at age 30. The chances of miscarriage and genetic abnormalities also increase as a woman ages.

Obviously, then, delaying childbearing to establish a career and become more financially stable will affect how quickly – or how easily – a woman becomes pregnant.

Many treatments are now available for those having difficulty conceiving: drug-induced ovulation, which can be used by such drugs as Clomid; superovulation, in which drugs cause the production of many eggs; intrauterine insemination, where sperm is deposited directly into the uterus at the time of ovulation; donor insemination, where sperm from a donor rather than from the husband is used; in-vitro fertilization, where the egg is fertilized outside the woman's body and then replaced into the uterus; and the most radical method, intracytoplasmic sperm injection, in which the sperm is actually injected directly into a mature egg, and then deposited into the woman's uterus.

What is it like for a couple to want to have a baby, something that is supposed to come so naturally, but can't?

Rabbi Matthew Kaufman, 35, spiritual leader of the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation, and his wife Sara Urowitz Kaufman, 34, know because they have gone through it.

The couple, who were the spokespeople for World Infertility Month, had a successful outcome through intracytoplasmic sperm injection. Their son Abraham, now six months old, is their pride and joy.

They and Abraham appeared on several television stations, as well as in the North York Mirror and The CJN, and at press conferences. "People even stopped us in the grocery store," said Urowitz Kaufman.

The couple met in Philadelphia, where Kaufman was studying for the rabbinate, and Urowitz Kaufman was working. (She is now a graduate student working toward her PhD in health policy at the University of Toronto). They married in 1998, and moved to Toronto, Urowitz Kaufman's hometown.

At the end of 1999, the couple decided to try to have a baby. ("The first year, we weren't trying to get pregnant, but we weren't trying not to, either," said Rabbi Kaufman.)

But to their dismay, nothing happened. "What was supposed to be the most natural thing in the world, wasn't," said Urowitz Kaufman.

Upset, and realizing that the younger you are, the better your chances of having a successful pregnancy, they decided to take action, and go to a fertility clinic, where they came under the care of obstetrician gynecologist Carl Laskin.

After an exhaustive set of physical, psychological and emotional tests and interviews, Laskin determined that the best technique for them would be inter-uterine insemination. Urowitz Kaufman described the anguish of five unsuccessful attempts over a 10 month period, involving daily blood tests, ultrasounds and checks of hormonal levels.

"It becomes a way of life," Urowitz Kaufman said. "It can take a toll on the individual and on the couple." Fortunately, she said, "I was in a loving and supportive marriage, and I had a supportive doctor.

"He told me it's like running a marathon, not a sprint, and to be patient."

It turned out that even with the drugs, she was releasing at the most three eggs, too low a number to ensure success.

Finally, the doctor decided to try the most radical method, intracytoplasmic sperm injection. The first try worked.

"I was healthy and miserable – just like you are supposed to be when you are pregnant," said Urowitz Kaufman.

The Kaufmans said they shared their experience with their family, which allowed them to get much-needed support. When the Orgenon drug company, the sponsor of World Fertility Month, and the Infertility Awareness Association of Canada came looking for articulate and open people to be spokespeople, the Kaufmans, who were recommended by their fertility clinic, agreed.

"As a rabbi, I saw it as an opportunity to let people know more about me, and that the synagogue is a place to talk about what is, after all, a very stressful experience," Rabbi Kaufman said.

He has a message for couples going through the experience: be realistic, but know that it is important to maintain patience, hope and faith that an infertility treatment will work.

"The love you feel for your baby is immeasurable," he said.

Israel to bring Jews to the Galilee

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel is launching a drive to settle Jews in a region with a large Arab population – but its plans are not for the West Bank or Gaza Strip.

For the first time in the history of the World Zionist Organization, the group is planning to build communities inside the Green Line, the boundary that divides Israel proper from the West Bank. The goal is to build 30 new communities in the Negev and Galilee.

Both regions have large numbers of Arabs. The agency aims to bolster the Jewish population in the Galilee and Negev by 10 per cent within the next five years, part of ongoing efforts to fortify Israel's Jewish majority.

"For the first time, the WZO returns to the Green Line. This is a significant political statement," said Shai Hermesh, treasurer for the Jewish Agency for Israel. "If we do not change the entire settlement scene within five to 10 years, we will lose the battle."

As the WZO's partner organization, the Jewish Agency is the driving force behind the plan, which was adopted last October to relieve a sense of isolation among Jewish residents in parts of the Galilee.

A special task force, headed by the incoming chair of the board of the United Jewish Communities, Robert Goldberg, is charged with working out details of the new drive.

The new operation will be the largest such effort since the establishment of a chain of Jewish outposts throughout the Galilee 25 years ago. At the time, the Galilee was almost exclusively Arab.

This time, the drive will also include the Negev, with special emphasis on single-family farms that will encompass large plots of land. The aim is to offset the rapid growth of the area's Bedouin population. Three new Negev towns – Gvaot-Bar, near the Gaza Strip; Merhav-Am, in the central Negev; and Tzukim, in the Arava – have already been established.

Some Arab leaders, such as Knesset member Azmi Bishara, are denouncing the new plan as an indirect way to promote the transfer of Arabs out of Israel, Jewish Agency officials said.

The agency has not concealed its aim of tipping the demographic scale in favour of Zionists – not only Jews, but also Druze and Circassian communities in northern Israel. But it says its mandate is to serve the Jewish people.

"The Jewish Agency is the government of the Jewish people," said Hermesh, who served as mayor of a regional council in the Negev for 15 years before taking the Jewish Agency post about a year ago.

The new drive in the Galilee will focus on strengthening the districts of Carmel, Upper Nazareth, Ma'alot, Migdal Ha'emek and Afula, where Arabs constitute 78 per cent of the population. In the Negev, the drive will focus on the "arc," which begins in the northwestern Negev, the seamline with the Gaza Strip, and runs to the Hebron region.

Hermesh said the drive is the only way to ensure Israel remains a Jewish state.

The Jewish Agency is expected to spend $80 million in the project's first two years, and officials hope Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will make good on his promise to match $5 for every Agency dollar. The project is part of Partnership 2000, a Jewish Agency program that links Diaspora Jewish communities with Israeli communities.

Environmentalists oppose the new project, which will also focus on building the necessary infrastructure for new towns and paving new roads in the western Negev. They argue that massive construction projects in the region will cause irreparable damage to the environment. They also fear a drive would weaken existing towns, spur increased use of private cars and require large investments in infrastructure, waste water and energy.

According to the Ministry of Environment, a crowded country like Israel simply cannot afford dispersed communities like those called for in the Jewish Agency's plans.

The Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel also objects to the plan.

"Whatever open space is left in Israel, they try to put new settlements in," said Yohanan Darom, director of the society's northern branch office.

Darom said there was no justification for the establishment of new towns while many of those that already exist are suffering from social and economic difficulties.

Hermesh disagreed. "The 'greens' must decide whether they prefer a Jewish majority with the problems of single-family farms, or no such farms with an Arab majority," he said.

Sharon: Israel insists on fulfillment of every road map obligation

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last Thursday that Israel's biggest mistake in the past has been its restraint in responding to violations of previous agreements with the Palestinians.

"Past experience teaches us that once a diplomatic agreement has been reached, the greatest mistake is to ignore seemingly minor violations in its implementation," he said at a graduation ceremony at the National Security College, near Tel Aviv.

As examples, he cited Europe's willingness to overlook Nazi Germany's violations of agreements prior to World War II, as well as Israel's own experiences.

"For the past three years, we have paid a heavy price for Israel's restraint over the daily violations of the Oslo accords," he said.

"We paid for the fact that terrorist organizations were not disarmed, that illegal weapons were not collected, that the intolerable incitement against Israel in the educational system and the media never stopped."

Sharon said implementation of the first phase of the U.S.-backed road map to Middle East peace, including a "total cessation of violence," is beginning, but warned that Israel "will insist on the fulfilment of every obligation included in the road map. We will do this because only insisting that agreements be honoured will bring the longed-for peace."

He said the subsequent phases could not start until all the elements of previous stages are implemented, rejecting a Palestinian demand for a time line for carrying out the plan.

Later the same day, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat called for an emergency meeting of the Quartet of international mediators who drafted the road map – the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – to discuss "the escalation in Israeli action."

Arafat was speaking at a meeting of the senior leadership of the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the PA, including Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas and several ministers.

Before the meeting, Arafat's aide, Nabil Abu Rudeineh said they "would examine the Israeli escalation expressed through the lack of release of [Palestinian] prisoners, the continuation of the settlements, the refusal to withdraw from residential areas, and the construction of the wall," referring to the fence Israel is building to separate itself from the West Bank.

Important Notice to Holocaust Survivors and Their Heirs

If you are a Holocaust survivor or the heir of a Holocaust victim, you may have a legitimate unpaid Holocaust era life, education or dowry claim.

You can file a claim through a Claims Resolution Process set up by the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC). The Commission consists of representatives of United States insurance regulators, five European insurance companies and their subsidiaries, the State of Israel, worldwide Jewish and Holocaust survivor organizations and European regulators as Observers.

ICHEIC has managed an extensive research effort to identify potential policyholders. In total, 450,000 names have been published representing more than 500,000 insurance policies. The list will be updated with new names in the coming weeks. However, these lists are unlikely to include all the names of Holocaust victims who had insurance policies during the relevant period. People should not be discouraged from filing claims simply because their name or the names of family members do not appear on any published lists. Anyone who believes he or she has a valid life, education or dowry policy is encouraged to present the claim to ICHEIC.

The opportunity exists for you to receive payment if you submit a claim before September 30, 2003.

The Claims Resolution Process is a free service that provides individuals with a central source for information on, investigation into, and payment of these outstanding policies.

Canadian groups back Claims Conference

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian representatives joined the 57-member board of directors of the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (the Claims Conference) in a unanimous vote to retain the status quo in the distribution of money raised from the sale of Jewish-owned properties in what was once East Germany.

Eighty per cent of the funds will go to Holocaust survivors and to agencies that provide them with social services, while the remaining 20 per cent will continue to be allocated for Holocaust-education programs.

Canada cast both of its votes in favour of retaining the current allocation, said Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. Congress cast its one vote for the resolution while Michael Rosenberg, president of the Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, cast Canada's second vote in favour of the resolution.

The decision to support the 80/20 distribution was something of a reversal for the Canadian survivors association, which had resolved prior to the board meeting to push for a 90/10 split. Rosenberg said he changed his mind after hearing the position of the Claims Conference and its assurance that it would lobby the German government for larger pensions for indigent Jews.

Rosenberg said survivors groups were divided on the issue, with the Gathering of American Holocaust Survivors, the second-largest survivors organization behind the one in Israel, pushing for 100 per cent allocation to survivors. Other international survivors associations favoured varying formulas.

"After lengthy discussions, pro and con, the vote was held to retain the status quo," he said.

The U.S. group was reflecting the views of survivor communities, particularly the ones in Florida, where many are living below the poverty line and who believe any funds coming from Germany would best be used to alleviate their plight.

Canada found itself on the same side of the issue as survivors groups from Ukraine and Russia, which also called for spending on Jewish and Holocaust education.

"Yes they need the assistance, but they want money for Jewish education" which they lacked for many years under Communism, Rosenberg said.

In other developments, the Claims Conference, which distributes funds from a number of restitution programs, announced pensions of 63,000 survivors in 61 countries would increase by 5.6 per cent this year, with payments beginning in the next quarter and retroactive to Jan. 1, 2003. The increases will total an extra $11 million (all figures US) per year.

Claims Conference officials say 75 per cent of allocations from all settlements, including those from Germany, Austria and Switzerland, have gone to help survivors, and that 80 per cent of the East German funds go to benefit survivors.

Of the $578 million allocation by the conference since 1995, nearly $86 million has gone for educational projects such as support for the research database at Israel's Yad Vashem museum, legal aid to help survivors in the reparations process and youth trips to Holocaust sites in Europe and Israel.

Last year, Rabbi Israel Singer, the Claims Conference president, angered some survivors groups when he wrote that more funds should be earmarked "for the future needs of the Jewish people," including day school education.

That prompted some survivors groups to step up their lobbying efforts for a greater share of the restitution funds.

American survivors organizations have pushed to revise the 80/20 policy on the distribution of the Goodwill Fund, which was established in the mid 1990s to distribute compensation funds from the sale of unclaimed Jewish property in what was once East Germany. So far, $450 million has flowed through the Claims Conference and a total of $1 billion is expected to be raised once all unclaimed Jewish properties are sold.

Other funds administered by the Claims Conference include the Swiss Bank settlement to assist needy Jewish victims of Nazism, the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, for social services benefiting Jewish Nazi victims, an Austrian bank settlement, an Austrian government fund and the Mauerbach sale of unclaimed Jewish-owned art.

"We need to deal with more than the terrorism. There are a lot of good things happening and we must focus on that as well. Ilan started something unique in the world and I am bound to continue it," said Ramon, who had just returned from a month in Israel.

She credits her children, Assaf 15½, Tal, 13, who celebrated his bar mitzvah in April, David, 10, and Noa, 6, with helping her deal with the tragedy.

"Actually, we are helping each other heal," she said from her kitchen, while urging her children to finish their lunch of soup and sandwiches.

"We are trying to see the joy in life; we need to enjoy what we have. That is what Ilan would have wanted for us more than anything else.

"It's a tough change, and it's hard to adjust to a new way of living, but we do. We have no choice."

As an Israeli, she has witnessed a lot of pain and suffering in the past few years, she said, "but that does not make this tragedy any easier to accept.

"We never get used to pain or loss. It is like losing your arm; it doesn't matter if you lost your leg before that. You mourn your arm just as much."

They cannot ignore the pain, and they have not gotten used to it, she said, "but we have learned to live with it. Ilan would be proud of us.

"We cry and we are sad, but at the same time we are happy. We try to keep a routine, and most of all, we try to laugh. Together, we are dealing with our trauma."

Ilan gave her the tools to deal with his death, she said. "For years, I lived with a person who always saw the glass half full. Even if there was only a little drink left, he would always make the best of it.

"We are living in the darkest of times, but we are making the best of it and we are working on our happiness. It is a different life, but it is a good life."

Israel is their home, she said, "but in the meantime we need to stay put. The family of Columbia has been a tremendous support to us, and it is important for us to remain for a while.

"We do plan on going home sometime soon. The kids see themselves as Israelis, and that is where we belong."

Ramon will be in Toronto on Aug. 13 when Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University honours its former president Marty Goldberg for his efforts on behalf of the university, as well as the Jewish community of Toronto and the State of Israel.

"There has always been a place in my heart for Toronto because of the people that live there. The Goldberg family is very special to us, and it is important for me to be there when he is honoured," said Ramon who will be the guest speaker at the event.

She plans to deliver a message of hope and optimism. "The main thing is to raise healthy, happy and educated children."

Montrealer named to Supreme Court

Fish taught advanced criminal law at McGill, and lectured at the Universities of Montreal and Ottawa.

Well-respected by his colleagues, he is known for the literary quality and the prodigious quantity of his judgments, his courteous demeanor in court and his sage, profound grasp of the law.

In 2000, he was a member of a Quebec Court of Appeal tribunal that ordered a Superior Court judge taken off a case because he had made improper remarks while hearing a case involving an Orthodox Jewish couple in St. Jerome court. Zipora and Moshe Amzallag complained that Justice Roland Durand had made "uncalled-for, religious-specific remarks," which they found offensive.

Durand was later reprimanded by the Canadian Judicial Council.

Full coverage of the appointment will appear next week.

French synagogue ransacked, death slogan on wall

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

PARIS — A synagogue in a Paris suburb was ransacked last week in what French Jewish leaders said was the first such anti-Semitic attack in France since the end of the Iraq war.

Prayer books were thrown on the floor, the Torah scrolls were opened and cash was stolen after the break-in last Friday night at Ohr Menahem Synagogue, its administrator Jean-Claude Myara said.

Written on an outside wall was "juif=mort" (Jew=death).

"This is a violation of our integrity. We feel like we've been raped," said Myara.

Ohr Menahem also serves as a community centre in the northern Paris suburb of Saint-Denis, an area heavily populated by North African immigrants, and worshippers fear the incident could be followed by more attacks, Myara said.

"Our fear is that this could happen again," he said. "We worry this was just a first visit."

Israel's policy of targeted killings is a two-edged sword

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel has all but frozen the targeted killings of Palestinian militants so that the current ceasefire can be maintained.

The truce, which took effect on June 29 after a particularly vicious tit-for-tat round of Israeli and Palestinian attacks, has led to a drastic reduction in the incidence of violence, the bane of the peace process.

If the ceasefire holds, Israel and the Palestinian Authority may yet succeed in implementing the preliminary steps of the road map, the peace plan conceived by the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

In deference to the road map, Israel officially suspended its policy of assassinating key Palestinian leaders. But "ticking bombs" – Palestinians planning or trying to carry out acts of terrorism – are still fair game, as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has warned.

Targeted killings, a policy of last resort that has drawn much international criticism, became common-place during the present Palestinian uprising.

But in fact, they predate the intifadah by several decades.

During the mid-1950s, Israeli mail bombs disposed of senior Egyptian intelligence officials who had helped plan guerrilla raids from the Gaza Strip.

Less than a decade later, Israeli mail bombs maimed German scientists who had developed missiles for Egypt.

In 1971, an Israeli general named Ariel Sharon conducted a series of successful anti-guerrilla operations against Palestinian cells in Gaza.

After the slaughter of 11 Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich summer Olympics, the Mossad systematically hunted down the Black September terrorists behind the massacre.

In April 1973, an Israeli commando squad led by Ehud Barak, a future prime minister, landed in Beirut and wiped out three senior leaders of the Fatah movement.

An Israeli force commanded by Israel's current chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, killed the PLO's second-in-command, Khalil al-Wazir (Abu Jihad), in Tunis, Tunisia, in 1988.

In 1992, Israeli helicopters in southern Lebanon fired missiles at the car of Abbas Musawi, the leader of Hezbollah, killing him and his family.

Israel assassinated Fathi Shikaki, the head of Islamic Jihad, in Malta in 1995. And in a botched operation in 1997 in Amman, the Mossad tried to kill Khaled Meshal of Hamas' political bureau.

The first Palestinian to be killed in the second intifadah was Fatah activist Hussein Abayat. He was struck by a missile in November 2000 while driving his car near Bethlehem. Since then, Israel has killed more than 100 Palestinian militants.

But hapless bystanders have also been killed. Gen. Dan Halutz, the commander of the Israeli Air Force, said recently that innocent civilians have been killed 30 per cent of the time.

From a purely operational point of view, targeted killings are somewhat effective. They knock out important personnel, they keep would-be bombers on the run and they impede the effectiveness of organizations reliant on a few pivotal individuals.

Yet, as American scholar Steven David has stated, no compelling evidence exists that targeted killings reduce the terrorist threat to Israel's national security or deter dedicated suicide bombers.

Furthermore, Israeli pinpoint assassinations trigger further Arab animosity and provoke almost instant retaliation.

The death of Yiyeh (The Engineer) Ayyash by a booby-trapped cell phone in January 1996 unleashed a wave of bombings that claimed the lives of 60 Israelis in a matter of days and ruined Shimon Peres' chance of defeating Benjamin Netanyahu in that year's election.

The 2001 killing of Mustafa Zibri, the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, led to the assassination of the first Israeli cabinet minister, Rehavam Ze'evi. The killing of Fatah leader Raed Karmi in January 2002 shattered a brief lull in the fighting and caused still more Israeli deaths. Similarly, the attempted assassination of Hamas co-founder Abdel Aziz Rantisi this past June precipitated a suicide bombing that killed 17 bus passengers in Jerusalem.

Targeted killings, therefore, are a two-edged sword.

Belgium revises controversial war crimes law

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The lower house of Parliament approved a bill July 29 revisiting Belgium's controversial war crimes law, clearing the first hurdle in removing provisions under which complaints were filed against U.S. President George W. Bush and other world leaders.

The 150-member Chamber of Representatives approved the measure by a vote of 89-3, with 34 abstentions. The vote paved the way for quick adoption by the Senate late last week and a signature by King Albert II, who must sign all bills into law under the Belgian constitution.

Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt agreed last month to replace the law with one limited to cases involving Belgian citizens or residents as victims or suspects. It also ensures the full immunity of all world leaders and other government officials who visit Belgium.

Under the controversial law, Belgian courts were given powers to try war crimes cases regardless of where the alleged offenses occurred or the nationality of those involved. But it became an embarrassment to the government after complaints were filed against U.S., British and Israeli leaders.

"We are a small country, we cannot act as an international judge in these cases," said Liberal-Democrat Stef Goris, who introduced the bill during the debate. Cases filed this spring against U.S. and British officials in connection with the Iraq war led to the Bush administration threatening to move North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) headquarters out of Belgium unless the law was scrapped.

"There was American pressure, but there were also other pressure or friendly warnings from France and Germany suggesting that if Brussels was to be home to international organizations or meetings, that this law could be problematic," socialist Dirk Van der Maelen, deputy head of the parliament's foreign affairs committee said.

Brussels, which is headquarters to the European Union and the NATO alliance, receives thousands of diplomats, ministers and leaders a year, to attend various meetings, summits or conferences. Cases against Bush, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and U.S. Iraq war commander Gen. Tommy Franks have already been rejected by Belgian authorities, using earlier amendments to the old law.

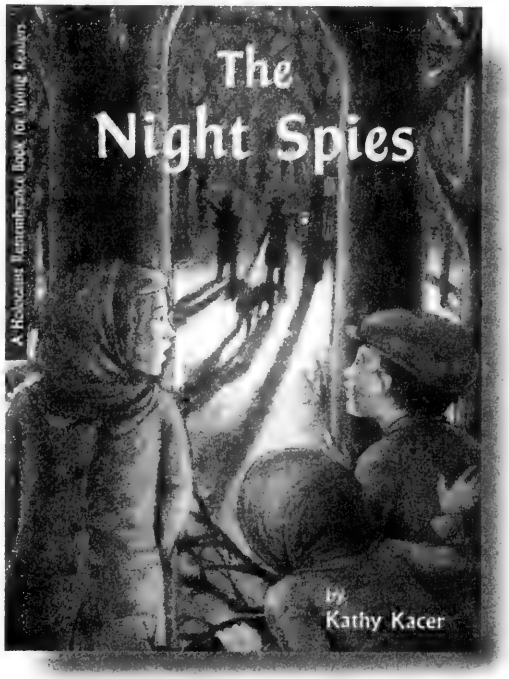
The Night Spies

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



How would you feel if you had to stay in a tiny room all day and most of the night? If you were dependent for food on the kindness of people you hardly knew? Or if you were afraid evil people would find you and maybe kill you?

Sounds pretty horrible, doesn't it? But that's what happened to Gabi, her mother and her cousin Max in Kathy Kacer's new book The Night Spies (Second Story Press, 2003).

It was during World War II. To hide them from the Nazis, a neighbour, Joseph, took Gabi, her mother and Max from their home to a small farming community, where they were welcomed by the town priest, who believed that helping them was "the least that decent people can do when the rest of the world seems to have gone mad."

The family was taken to the small farmstead of the Kos family. Mr. Kos had worked for Gabi's father, who had been very kind to him and his family. Mr. Kos had arranged a small hiding place in the hayloft of the barn, which was attached to the house. Gabi's family had to stay there most of the time, except when they came into the kitchen at night to eat.

At first it was exciting, but soon the children, especially Max, who was only 11, got very frustrated with staying inside all the time. They got on each other's nerves, and begged to be allowed to at least go for a walk.

Finally, Max couldn't stand it anymore, and, persuading Gabi to go with him, snuck out of the barn at night and went into the nearby woods. After this happened several times, they met a group of partisans, men and women who organized themselves into small groups, armed themselves and fought the Nazis.

The children, helped by the Kos' granddaughter Eva, were able to help them by bringing them information about a road the Nazis were building, and later about enemy soldiers who came to the town. They also brought them clothes and food.

They even got to take part in a partisan attack on the Nazi soldiers guarding the prisoners building the road.

The Kos family was very brave to hide the family, since if they had been caught, they would certainly have been killed. Mrs. Kos was especially terrified, and had as little as possible to do with them.

Like her other books, The Secrets of Gabi's Dresser and Clara's War, The Night Spies is based on the story of Kacer's mother, who was the Gabi in this book and in Gabi's Dresser. Even though the family in fact were hidden in several different places, rather than just one, The Night Spies shows the experience of the many Jews who managed to survive the war, thanks to the kindness and courage of Christian families.

Rabbi Yehuda the Prince, also known simply as Rebbi, edited the collection of Jewish law and commentary known as the Mishnah. He lived in Israel circa 200 CE.*

"Oh no! They're coming for me! They took my mother and my sister and now they want me!"* The terrified calf frantically ran back and forth in his pen. "Here comes the lady who wants to eat me! Here comes the butcher with his big sharp knife! He's opening the gate!"

The butcher unlatched the gate of the pen, and it swung open. There was only one thing to do. The desperate calf dashed between the legs of the surprised butcher and fled into the busy marketplace, with the butcher in hot pursuit.

"He's chasing me! And he's faster than I am! There must be somewhere I can hide! He's getting closer! Somebody save me! That rabbi over there, maybe he'll save me. Rabbi, Rabbi, save my life! Don't let them kill me!"

Rabbi Yehuda the Prince looked down at the cowering calf. "You were created to be eaten," he said coldly. Don't try to hide from your destiny." He stood by and watched as the butcher scooped up the struggling calf and brought it back to the slaughtering block.

Rabbi Yehuda turned back to the student accompanying him. "Anyway, as I was saying, it's obvious that the blessing on the matzah is only going to — Owww!"

"Master, is everything all right?"

"Yes, yes. The blessing will only exempt the — OUCH!"

"Master!"

"My tooth! Owwww! Oh, it hurts!" I don't understand. It OUCH! felt fine a moment ago. It'll probably go away soon as fast as it — OOOH! came."

But it didn't. The painful toothache persisted for 13 years, despite Rabbi Yehuda's desperate attempts to stop it. Nothing he tried helped. Until...

It was late afternoon in Rabbi Yehuda's palace, and the servant girl was sweeping the banquet hall. She noticed some baby mice huddled in the corner, and went to sweep them into the dust heap along with the rest of the garbage.

"Oh no! Here comes the big evil monster! And in her paw, she wields the vicious brush of death! This is the end!" The baby mice closed their eyes in dread.

"Miriam."

The servant girl stopped. Her master was calling her. "Don't kill those — OW! — poor mice. Their mother will be pained by their death. Instead, just..."

Rabbi Yehuda the Prince stopped short in surprise. The toothache that had plagued him for 13 years was gone.

Bankruptcy trustee Cyril Sapiro deals with the human side of debt

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

There are more than 800 bankruptcy trustees in Canada, and Cyril Sapiro, a Torontonian trained as a chartered accountant, is one of them.

Sapiro has his work cut out for him. Last year, some 78,000 Canadians declared personal bankruptcy.

Under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, they were required to settle their tangled affairs with a trustee, an officer of the court who deals with the human wreckage of out-of-control debt.

"We're dealing with people who are very distraught and embarrassed," said Sapiro, who compares himself to a social worker. "These people have screwed up big time. They realize they have not lived within their means. They're suddenly doused by a cold shower of financial reality."

The sole principal of Cyril Sapiro & Co. Ltd., he treats debtors – who are given every opportunity to stave off bankruptcy – with sensitivity, care and good humour.

"Bankruptcy, for many, is a life cycle event, almost like a financial death," explained Sapiro, who has been a trustee for the past 26 years.

"Debtors come to us when the debt burden is too much to bear. If we do our work professionally, the creditors get something, the debtor is released from debt and the trustee gets paid."

Bankruptcies are affected by a number of factors: the business cycle, access to easy credit, a volatile stock market, heavy student loan debt and the failure of the self-employed to file income tax returns and pay taxes promptly.

Canadians fall into the abyss of debt, or, worse still, bankruptcy, for a number of reasons.

They use credit cards out of necessity rather than convenience.

They constantly borrow money.

They can only pay the interest and services charges, rather than the principal, of a loan.

When Sapiro senses that a debtor may break down in tears, he attempts to deflate the tension with a few well-practised tricks of the trade.

Sapiro, who may be likened to a standup comedian, may produce a laminated New Yorker cartoon about the ageless travails of bankruptcy.

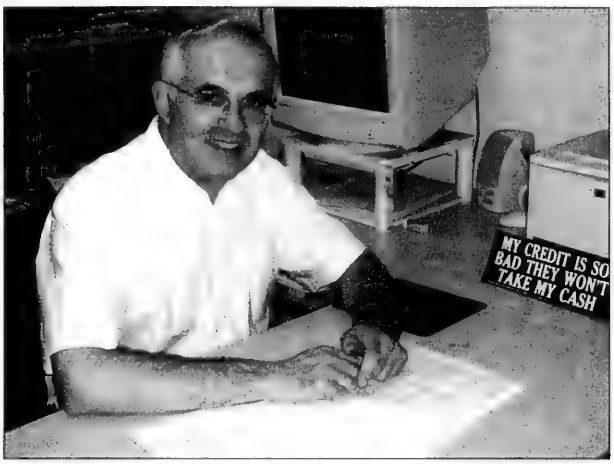
He may offer "bankruptcy candies" (Life Savers) or cookies.

And if a debtor is unemployed, he will activate his tape deck and play Get a Job, a song recorded by The Silhouettes, one of his favourite rock bands.

If all else fails, Sapiro proffers an outsized box of Kleenex.

These strategems pay off. "If we're effective in reducing stress and confusion, the debtor more likely has a better chance of rehabilitation as a financially responsible person," he said.

When debtors visit Sapiro's office, they get to see his private bankruptcy museum, a repository of hundreds of humourous buttons, bumper stickers, T-shirts, gag credit cards, crying towels and coffee mugs, all symbolic of trouble, debt and taxes.



Cyril Sapiro

The museum serves a theraputic purpose. "It brings a smile to a sad face and reduces the emotional pain of coming to see me in the first place."

There is no such thing as a typical debtor, noted Sapiro, who extracts his fees from the assets of estates he administers.

Debtors display a wide range of emotions. "Some are calm and others are emotional basket cases," Sapiro said.

"They're just like you and me, except that they owe money. We see some sad cases as a result of illness, job losses, business failure and the inevitable financial stress that causes family breakups. On the other hand, we get funny stories as well."

In a typical month, Sapiro sees 20 to 40 debtors at his office at 161 Eglinton Avenue East, "from those who have been very wealthy to welfare cases, from PhDs to illiterates."

Not all debtors will officially go bankrupt. "Some won't have to and others will put off making a decision until a law suit or garnishee [a court-authorized payment of debt] forces them to take action."

And debtors and bankrupts are not limited to this or that nationality. "The ethnic mix covers the normal spectrum of Toronto and includes some Jews."

Bankrupts are obliged to turn over their assets, aside from personal effects, clothing, furniture and a modest car, to a trustee.

In addition, they must surrender credit cards (often the source of their financial self-destruction), provide income tax information, disclose family income and living expenses and pay part of their surplus income to creditors.

Typically, debtors can choose from a variety of options to settle a claim.

"Sometimes, the solution is to do nothing, when even the angriest creditors can't garnishee the pensions or welfare payments of a destitute person.

"Occasionally, an informal settlement can be negotiated. If not, then the alternatives are to offer the creditors a formal proposal or simply to consider bankruptcy."

Sapiro does not dispense legal advice, "but if a person needs such advice, we refer them to a specialist," he said.

Sapiro's field is riven with misconceptions, from the notion that bankrupts stand to lose everything to the idea that their plight will be brutally exposed by a newspaper advertisement.

First-time debtors filing bankruptcy are entitled to an automatic discharge after nine months, providing there is no opposition.

Within about a year of a discharge, a bankrupt can open a savings account, apply for a department store credit card or take out a small loan.

"Most people go bankrupt only once in a lifetime," he observed. "In second or third bankruptcies, however, the nine month discharge does not apply and the bankruptcy court may impose conditions in granting a discharge."

Sapiro, who was born in Edmonton in 1939, is the son of a Romanian immigrant who was a grocery store owner and a vending machine distributor and of a homemaker who was born and raised in the Saskatchewan Jewish farming colony of Lipton.

He studied at a Talmud Torah in Edmonton and earned degrees at the University of Alberta and the University of Chicago.

While qualifying to be a chartered accountant, he taught accounting and income tax courses at York University.

He became a trustee because he had tired of the accounting profession. "I found insolvency work more interesting and less stressful than that of a regular CA practitioner," he said.

Indeed, the work of a trustee can be quite rewarding. "Our staff gets hugs, thank you cards and boxes of chocolate from people we've helped," he said.

Sapiro must be doing something right.

Actress/writer tackles aging with a sense of humour

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Botox, ex-husbands and weight gain are things most women would rather keep to themselves.

But in her one-woman-show, Sixty With More Lies About My Weight, Susan Freedman shares all her stories about her life as a 60-something.

Sharply dressed and donning fiery red lipstick, Freedman, a slender woman with cropped silver hair, speaks frankly to her audience about everything from her memory loss to her family's quirks and foibles.

Sixty, a follow-up to her first performance, Fifty-Seven and Still Lying About My Weight, is making its rounds at Fringe Festivals across Canada. It recently wrapped up runs in Toronto and Winnipeg, and will be in Edmonton Aug. 14-24.

When Freedman sat down to write Fifty-Seven, she says, she wanted to give older women something to relate to.

"Many of the [Fringe] shows were [about] the angst of late 20- and 30-somethings. I'd seen a lot about relationships and finding yourself and I thought, 'How about writing something for 50-somethings? We too have things to say,'" says Freedman.

Most of the people who come to see Freedman's show are women her age, she says. Frequently, they'll approach her after a performance and confess to having had Botox treatments or recount their adventures babysitting their grandchildren.

"We are so much more alike than we are different from one another," she says.

But what's the difference between being 57 and being 60?

"I don't feel very different. I feel a bit more experienced," she says. "The writing was much easier because I knew what worked. I'm a bit smarter from having done it."

In Fifty-Seven, Freedman incorporated stories from her past, including her childhood in Winnipeg and two failed marriages.

Of Sixty, she says, "Now I'm really talking about being where I am."

Freedman has loved theatre since she was a child. She trained in theatre schools in Edmonton and Calgary, and then spent 16 years working for CBC Radio as a producer, director and manager until her job was cut in 1991. After studying for a few years at another theatre school in London, England, Freedman came back to Canada and got involved in the marketing end of Vancouver's Fringe Festival. Several years later, she decided to write her own play.

Because plays are picked by lottery, rather than quality at Fringe Festivals, Freedman said, "You see some exquisitely fabulous ones and you see some that are really, really bad. And the really bad ones, rare though they are, gave me the courage to think that maybe I could write a Fringe show."

Susan Freedman still lies about her weight.

Freedman is now on the road with her third husband and stage manager Bill Galloway, whom she frequently pokes fun at onstage.

While Bill can find his way to any destination on Earth, locating items around the house remains an impossibility, Freedman says. Her words in the play are: "If it doesn't jump out and hit him in the face, he declares it lost."

About men in general, she says, "If God hadn't attached it, overpopulation wouldn't be a problem."

Freedman's in-laws, grandchildren and friends also find their way into her performance. She says she consulted each person before the show and everyone was a good sport about it.

A slide show accompanies Freedman's monologue. Goofy family photos and scribbled magic-marker drawings pop up on a small screen as she talks.

"I'm going to be up there alone. God, they've gotta have something else to look at. What am I going to do? Put on funny hats?" she says.

The photos, she says, remind the audience that her life is not very unusual.

"They really could be anybody's pictures," she says.

The occasional musical interlude also adds a playful flavour to her performance. Each time a campy song comes on – dance numbers seem to pop out of nowhere – Freedman reaches into a bag, throws on a hot pink feather boa and enormous sunglasses and struts around the stage.

The whole idea, she says, is to have fun. "You're not going to get through life having much of a good time without a sense of humour."

YIDDISH CULTURE COUNCIL OF TORONTO REMEMBERS MURDERED SOVIET POETS

The Yiddish Culture Council, the Committee for Yiddish and Beth Tzedec Synagogue mark the 51st anniversary of the murder of Soviet Jewish poets and intellectuals with an evening of poetry and music.

The Night of the Silenced Poets, chaired by David Abramowitz, features examples of the works of some of the martyred artists, as well as some poetic tributes. Israeli guest artists are Eti Kovenska, star of the Yiddish and Hebrew stage and screen, and pianist Lev Kogan.

The free program is presented in English and Yiddish. Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St., Tuesday, Aug. 12, 7:30 p.m.

Rock of Ages: The Toronto-based Jewish rock group Shirayim is gearing up to play a big, end-of-summer concert at Clinton's Tavern in early September, with The Down Under Project and Bais Groove scheduled as opening acts.

A former bar mitzvah band, Shirayim has gained a larger fan base by playing original musical compositions with lyrics from Torah, Tehillim and other Jewish texts. The band has played at Hart House, Clinton's and several other downtown venues in the past year.

"We are trying to do something very unique in this city by creating an atmosphere where all kinds of Jewish people can come together, feel comfortable and enjoy great Jewish rock music," said lead guitarist Yoni Goldstein, who adds that Shirayim has a few tentative play dates for next year in the United States.

Audition Call: Markham Little Theatre is holding auditions for roles in The Last Resort, a musical by Leslie Arden and Norm Foster, set for a November run. Candidates are asked to prepare 12 to 16 bars of an upbeat Broadway song, and to bring voice-appropriate music. Script readings may also be included.

Cedar Grove Community Centre, 7667 14th Ave. (east of Reesor Road) Aug. 13 and 17, 7:30 p.m. Katheryn DeLory, 416-440-0592.

Names in the News

• Toronto playwright Adam Pettle was recently profiled in the Jewish Chronicle of London, England, where his family drama, Sunday Father, opened last month. The paper gave three stars (out of five) to the production and said that Pettle "writes with wit and a sharp eye about the lifelong effect of broken marriages on children."

• Stewart and Lynda Resnick, arts patrons and owners of the California-based Franklin Mint, have won a four-year legal battle for the right to use the image of the late Princess Diana on its products. The firm, which is worth an estimated $730 million US, has countersued the Princess Diana Memorial Fund for millions of dollars in damages, which it intends to donate to charity.

• Pop diva Madonna has contributed a considerable sum towards construction of an $8-million centre for the study of kabbalah in the west end of London.

Encyclopedic approach to exorcism

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

One day about 10 years ago, a teenaged Russian immigrant to Israel witnessed a fatal traffic accident through her window. The tragedy occurred on a Friday afternoon. The next day, the 17-year-old witness, Menuhah, showed her sister where it had occurred.

There was still blood on the road and Menuhah, being almost as superstitious as she was religious, didn't want to point at it with her fingers. Instead she used her foot, and her foot inadvertently touched the blood. From that moment on, Menuhah believed herself possessed of the spirit of the dead girl, whose name, she learned from a radio report, had been Miri.

Menuhah began experiencing stomach pains, confusion and headaches, which she related to having stepped on Miri's blood. Soon her life took another bizarre twist: she fell in love with a soldier whom she met in the cemetery on Jerusalem's Mount Herzl. Such a liaison being forbidden among the Orthodox, Menuhah's parents attempted to segregate her.

When her troubles persisted for three months, Menuhah's parents arranged to take her to Rabbi Daniel, a kabbalist of Moroccan background known in certain circles for conducting aliyot or ascents into the spirit world for the purpose of exorcising dybbuks or spirits.

Rabbi Daniel and his wife were quick to confirm that there was a spirit inhabiting Menuhah, that it belonged to Miri, and that the dead girl had forced Menuhah to fall in love with a soldier because she had also loved a soldier.

This contemporary account of the exorcism of a dybbuk is one of several such episodes reported in the Israeli news media in recent decades, and one of many to occur throughout Jewish history.

What makes it extremely rare is that the exorcist happened to be a woman: it was the rebbetzin who, in the end, coaxed the spirit of the dead girl to leave Menuhah's body.

What also distinguishes this episode is the level of its documentation. Tamar Alexander, a professor of Hebrew literature from Ben-Gurion University, observed it closely and recorded the first-person stories of three participants – Menuhah, her father and the rebbetzin.

Alexander's fascinating scholarly analysis constitutes one of a dozen essays in Spirit Possession in Judaism: Cases and Contexts from the Middle Ages to the Present. Edited by Matt Goldish, the 476-page book was published recently by Wayne State University Press as part of its Raphael Patai series in Jewish folklore and anthropology.

Anyone familiar with Patai's works will see the same high level of intellectual scope and depth mirrored here.

Spirit Possession in Judaism offers a wide-ranging, encyclopedic approach that includes a discussion by Jonathan Seidel of possession and exorcism in the texts of the Cairo Geniza, a treatment by Lawrence Fine and J. H. Chajes of spirit possession in 16th-century Safed, a discussion by Goldish of Nathan of Gaza's early prophecies, a recounting by Roni Weinstein of the mystical career of 17th-century Italian Rabbi Moses Racuto and an analysis by Yoram Bilu of possession illnesses in three Jewish milieus.

Joseph Dan's masterful introduction pays tribute to the work of scholar Gershon Scholem, while the cover art pays homage to the 1937 film The Dybbuk, based on S. Anski's famous play, which brought the dybbuk legend to Jewish popular awareness. Texts of various Judaic works involving spirit possessions are presented in 10 appendices.

The authors approach the subject through many doors – religion, mysticism, literature, anthropology, psychology, history, folklore – leaving the reader to recall the Shakespearean observation, "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." But then again, the Jews have understood that ever since Abraham.

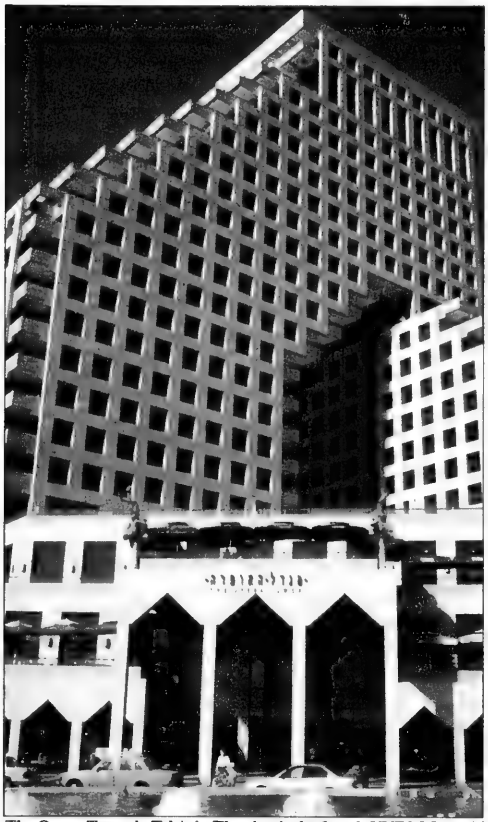
TEL AVIV DESIGNATED WORLD HERITAGE SITE

UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, has designated Tel Aviv a world heritage site because of its "White City" architecture. The thriving Israeli city is one of 24 new sites that the world body recently added to its list of 754 such locations recognized for their "outstanding universal value."



The Opera Tower in Tel Aviv. The city is the fourth UNESCO world heritage site in Israel. [IGTO photo]

What makes this designation almost unprecedented is that Tel Aviv is one of very few 20th-century sites to win UNESCO's approval. Almost every other designated site is "either a natural wonder or hundreds or thousands of years old," said Rami Levi, Israel's tourism ambassador to North and South America.

Founded as a garden suburb of the ancient Mediterranean port of Jaffa in 1909, Tel Aviv quickly bloomed into the commercial, entertainment and cultural capital of Israel. While Jerusalem is Israel's capital city, Tel Aviv has become the focus of Israel's largest urban conglomeration, home to almost three million people.

Tel Aviv is also home to more Bauhaus or International Style architecture than any city in the world.

During the 1920s and 1930s, as German-Jewish architects at the heart of the Bauhaus movement left Germany for what was then Palestine, Tel Aviv — literally overnight — adopted their style as a route to defining the character of the new Jewish city burgeoning on the Mediterranean.

By the mid-1930s it was the only city on earth being built entirely in the International Style defined by simple concrete curves, boxy shapes, small windows set in large walls, glass-brick towers and sweeping terraces all washed with white.

Viewed from the air, Tel Aviv appeared as a vision of startling white, hence the appellation "White City."

If many of Tel Aviv's Bauhaus buildings are a delight for visitors, they are sometimes a nightmare for owners. Sixty, 80 and 90 years after they were built, many are in disrepair.

With the aid of generous municipal subsidies, hundreds of the buildings have been restored into notable apartment buildings, offices, private houses, restaurants and hotels. One of the loveliest restorations saw the former Esther movie theater in Dizengoff Circle transformed into the boutique Cinema Hotel, which still retains the sweeping staircases, tall windows and curving balconies of its former identity.

Tel Aviv is the fourth UNESCO world heritage site in Israel, after the Old Cities of Jerusalem and Akko, and Masada.

Tourism Increase: It's turning out to be a sunny summer for Israel's tourism industry as the number of visitors continues to rise.

According to latest statistics, Israel welcomed 89,000 tourists in June — a 44 per cent increase over the same period in 2002. The joyful June results follow a 36 per cent increase in May and a 16 per cent increase in April. The number of nights in which tourists stayed at Israeli hotels rose significantly as well.

The turnaround is leaving Israel's Tourism Minister Benny Elon and other ministry officials cautiously optimistic. Elon sees the trend continuing, with 1.2 million tourists arriving in Israel by the end of 2003.

"It looks like we've turned the corner," said Dani Shahal, Israel's consul for tourism in Canada. "As talk of peace and steps toward peace in the Middle East continue, Canadians are more willing to visit Israel."

Israel Notes

• Faced with a decrease of eight metres in the water level over the past decade, Israel and Jordan are talking about a canal to connect the Gulf of Aqaba with the Dead Sea. Besides bringing water to the Dead Sea, the lowest point on earth, the project could also generate hydro-electricity. The Dead Sea region is one of the world's most popular tourist destinations, and has become a therapeutic centre for visitors suffering from skin disorders or respiratory ailments.

• Hundreds of Jewish singles between the ages of 21 and 36 from around the globe are preparing to visit Tel Aviv later this month for a week-long singles event. Participants of Summer Love 2003 will tour Israel's historic, religious and cultural sites by day, and visit the world-class restaurants, clubs and beaches of Tel Aviv-Jaffa by evening and night. The event runs August 25 to Sept. 1.

BENJAMIN'S PARK MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Arts & Travel

Being part of half a million people

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

I'm not a great Rolling Stones fan, nor an AC/DC fan, nor a Rush fan. I went to the Stones concert for Toronto for the experience, not the music. I went because I wanted to see what half a million people looked like, and because my friend's concert buddy wasn't available.

From the street, Downsview Park doesn't look very big. Inside was another story. It took two hours to get from Downsview station to the far side of the stage where my friends were sitting.

When Moses parted the Red Sea, I imagine it as having been cool, blue water that rose up to form a dry walkway. The concert also had a red sea, but it was red with sunburned bodies, wet with sweat and thick with the smell of sunscreen and smoke from cigarettes and marijuana.

When the sea of writhing, partially naked bodies eventually parted, it revealed a path strewn with empty plastic water bottles caked in dirt. If you didn't put your foot down solidly with each step, the crowds would sweep you away.

Walking was an obstacle course, a fight between looking forward to see where you were going and looking down to see what, or who, you were stepping on. At first I tried not to step on the blankets that were spread out like a giant patchwork quilt, but quickly changed my mind after dozens of feet marched past me as I sat on the ground. Then I was afraid to lie down on our dirty blanket in case someone stepped on my shins and cracked them.

Some people apparently felt sorry for stepping all over us. "Can I cross over your area?" asked one bald, beer-bellied man. "I've lost my wife and I think she went that way."

Most cellphones didn't work, but during the brief intermissions between bands when everyone sat down, some people wildly waved their cellphones at the sky, trying to get reception.

The growing crowd roared with half a million lungs as the Stones took to the stage. Mick Jagger, the wrinkly highlight of the evening, stomped around in a purplish jacket and bellowed into the mike. From where I was perched on someone else's shoulders, all I could see was a brightly coloured pinprick running across the stage. All around me was an endless sea of heads.

People periodically broke out into the birthday song for Jagger, who recently turned 60. Around us, several people were smoking up and the air took on a bluish hue.

The mad dash for the exits began even before the Stones finished playing. Minutes after their set ended, fireworks exploded in the distance. A diversionary tactic, we speculated, as we picked twigs and dead grass off our blankets.

As we trudged out of the park, the only sound was of empty water bottles crumpling under thousands of shoes. "So that's why they didn't allow glass bottles," said a friend as the sea of humanity rolled out of the park, along the streets and towards the subway.

Former Kadimahites gather as camp marks 60th year

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlanti c Correspondent

HALIFAX — Jamie Levitz's eyes light up as he steps onto the sports field at Camp Kadimah.

A Newfoundland native now practicing oral surgery in Toronto, Levitz has returned to the camp in Barss Corner, N.S., for the 60th anniversary of the camp he called home for a dozen summers in the 1950s and 60s.

"My body buzzes every time I walk in here," he says on the camp's visitor's day.

Betty Fineberg, then of Saint John, N.B. and now of Halifax, was here in 1945, two years after the camp opened.

"What changes I've seen here over the years," she says as she watches grandson Max Fineberg, 7, relish the food spread brought by his parents, Victor and Sybil, both former Kadimahites.

Max is the youngest camper this year, among 310 campers from across Canada and the United States. When Kadimah started in 1943, to bring together Jewish children from across a wide-spread region, there were 45 campers. It quickly grew to about 100, then by the 1960s and 1970s to close to 200.

As young Jewish adults moved out of the region and started their own families, they sent their children, and now grandchildren, to Kadimah. Today's number is the largest in history, with almost 85 per cent from outside the Atlantic region.

Carrie (Jacobson) Rotman of Toronto attended Kadimah for seven years. Her father, Semon, grew up in Halifax. He moved to Toronto but his children, and now five grandchildren, are enjoying the rustic area around Lake William where their grandfather swam, boated, played sports, learned more of his Jewish heritage, and developed friendships that have lasted a lifetime.

Carrie says she has "far too many memories to pick a favourite. But, if I had to, I guess Maccabia (the eagerly anticipated annual team competition in various sport and cultural activities) would be the best. I was on a winning team once," she laughs.

Her sister, Rosalie Meiteen of Toronto, has one child at Kadimah this summer. "It's all about family," she says.

Liane Stein is only 10 but the Toronto girl, daughter of Pam (Medjuck) Stein, understands the history of her family and Camp Kadimah. Her grandmother, Shirlee, was at the first camp. Her grandfather, Ralph, a former chair of the camp committee, started at Kadimah in 1945.

Liane says, "Everyone in my family has gone here. It's part of me to go here, too. I belong here."

She adds, "it's like a tradition. It gives me pride to know my family has been going here and that everyone in my family feels like I do."

Her brother Matthew, 12, says the fact his family has been here since it started "makes me feel like a Maritimer."

Ralph Medjuck, 70, recalls his time as the camp bugler. "It was my job to wake the camp each morning at seven by blowing [reveille on] the bugle. If I was late, I adjusted my watch and everyone else had to adjust theirs," he jokes.

Close to 1,000 people were at camp on this year's visitor's day, some from as far as California, Florida, Vancouver and New York City. They attended a reception the previous evening, renewing friendships with some people they had not seen in several decades and with some seen at visitor's day last year.

The sports field, which opened this year, is dedicated to the chairs of the camp committee.

In recent years, several new cabins, an arts and crafts building, and a refurbished waterfront and bridge connecting the two sides of Lake William on which the camp is located, have added to the package Kadimah offers its campers and staff.

But it's the memories that everyone takes away that bring them back year after year.

Joyce Pliskow Gordon from Halifax, was camp nurse from 1953 to 1955. "I earned $300 that first summer and it was hard work but I loved every minute. I saw everything from poison ivy to measles, chicken pox and a ruptured appendix. And that summer, my folks called me to tell me I got my Registered Nurse designation."

Gerry Levitz, past president of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council, is from Corner Brook, Nfld. and Labrador. His daughters, Stephanie and Naomi, like himself, were Kadimah campers and staff.

"We had some Jewish upbringing in Corner Brook with a synagogue and cheder[now long gone] but Kadimah made me even more Jewish. I made friends in my first year at Camp (1952) that have lasted a lifetime. I'll support it as long as I'm alive."

Memorable debut endears Kapler to Fenway Faithful

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Gabe Kapler thought it was cool when he recently learned that Boston Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein is also Jewish. That fact just added to what has become the most exciting time in his seven-year major league baseball career.

Since signing a minor league contract with the BoSox on June 24 and getting called back up to the big leagues four days later, Kapler's found himself "as happy as could possibly be right now."

And why not. He's playing for the first time on a perennial contender and will be involved in meaningful games over the season's final two months, something the Hollywood, Calif., native has never before experienced.

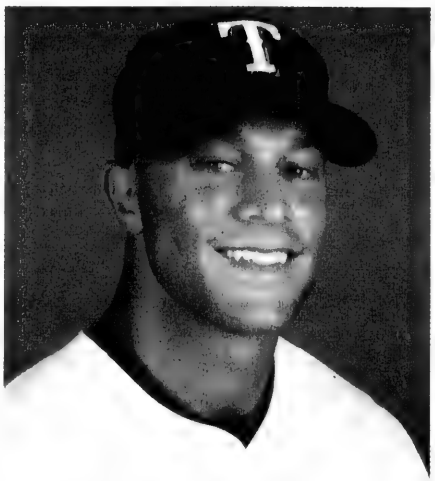
Kapler endeared himself to the Fenway faithful in a pair of memorable contests before the team embarked on a 13-game road trip leading up to the all-star break.

In his first four at-bats in a BoSox uniform against the Florida Marlins, he hit a double off the Green Monster, a single to left, a triple to centre, and a double down the left field line.

The next day, Kapler hit two homers and drove in four runs, equaling career highs in both categories.

"It was thrilling," said Kapler of his weekend debut, in which he went seven for nine with two homers, a triple, two doubles and seven RBIs. "The [Boston] fans are invigorating. They breathe a new kind of energy into you.

"There's real passion for the game there. It's almost like a religion for the people of Boston to be fans of the Sox and be around Fenway Park in the summer."



Gabe Kapler, when he was a Texas Ranger

After starting the season in Colorado as the club's fourth outfielder, the muscular six-foot-two, 210-pounder found himself in a hitting funk that ultimately got him demoted to Triple-A Colorado Springs. He hit .224 with four RBIs in 39 games this year with the Rockies.

Kapler later asked for his release, knowing six other teams were interested in giving him a big-league opportunity.

"In baseball, the timing of guys' struggles tend to be very important," he said. "Everybody struggles during the season, but if it is at the outset of the season, it can be magnified. I think that's just what happened. I struggled early on."

Kapler's job as the Red Sox's back-up outfielder is to hit against left-handed pitching, pinch-run, and prepare himself to play first base should he be called upon to field the position late in games.

He'll also offer the team a right-handed bat off the bench and the ability to play all three outfield positions.

Boston is Kapler's fourth team in the past five seasons. The 1998 Minor League Player of the Year was originally a 57th round draft pick of the Detroit Tigers in 1995.

He was dealt to the Texas Rangers following the 1999 season in a nine-player swap that included Juan Gonzalez. In 2000, his hard work produced a .302 average with 14 HRs and 66 RBIs, including a franchise-record 28-game hitting streak.

At last year's July 31 trade deadline, which coincided with his 27th birthday, Kapler was traded to Colorado. He played in 40 of the Rockies final 55 games and hit .311 with two homers and 17 RBIs.

"It was a welcome change at the time because things were kind of getting stagnant in Texas," said Kapler, who had a career best 10 outfield assists in 2002 between the two clubs. "A welcome surprise that turned out to be a great thing."

Much like his time thus far in Beantown.

UEFA won't permit Israeli teams to play at home

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — European soccer's governing body, UEFA, announced last week that European club matches involving Israeli teams would continue to be played at neutral venues outside Israel until at least mid-August. As a result, Maccabi Tel Aviv will not be able to host the return leg of its Champions League second qualifying round clash with Zilina. (In the first qualifying game, Maccabi lost to the Slovak champions, 1-0.)

UEFA said Israeli national team home games would also be played at neutral venues for the moment, though it promised the issue would be given further consideration.

Because of security concerns, in March 2002, UEFA suspended all competitive European matches in Israel. Last week's decision to maintain the ban came after a meeting of UEFA's Emergency Panel and follows discussions between UEFA, the Israel Football Association (IFA) and senior Israeli politicians, including Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom.

Hopes had been high that the ban would be lifted after Shalom met with UEFA secretary general Gerhard Aigner and told him security could be guaranteed as a result of the renewal of the peace process. Shalom brought with him letters of support from eight European foreign ministers, including Joschka Fischer of Germany, Franco Frattini of Italy and Ana Palacio of Spain. The European Union also empowered its president, Silvio Berlusconi, to call on UEFA to lift the ban.

Although the four-member Emergency Panel noted the positive developments in the region, it said more time was needed to evaluate the situation.

"The panel said it was of the view that an evaluation could only be made when a certain period of time had elapsed and that it would reconsider the matter in mid-August," UEFA said in a statement.

Meanwhile, the English press speculated that the decision to keep the ban in place was partly motivated by a desire to signal the organization's independence from Israeli and European political pressure. But both in Israel and on Fleet Street, another explanation was offered: they suggested that pressure was exerted by Chelsea, which will face Maccabi Tel Aviv in the Champions League if the latter gets past Zilina, to delay the decision so that they will not have to make the trip to Israel.

That was the view of Mark Ogden of the Daily Telegraph. "Since the draw was made, it has been obvious that Chelsea isn't interested in flying to Israel, both because of the security situation and because of their humiliating defeat at the hands of Hapoel Tel Aviv in the UEFA Cup.

"I'm sure that if Maccabi Tel Aviv had drawn a Scottish, Belgian or Czech side, it would have received the OK to play in Israel. UEFA didn't want to aggravate a club with the kind of financial clout that Chelsea has. They have a lot of money and a lot of influence in UEFA, and it seems the European football federation chose not to get on the wrong side of them," Ogden said.

Maccabi Tel Aviv chair Loni Herzikovic dismissed the speculation that Chelsea was behind the decision, but accused UEFA of making a political decision. "UEFA simply isn't brave enough to admit it was a political decision. If they think Budapest is safer than Tel Aviv, they're wrong… If Maccabi Tel Aviv gets past Zilina, the decision will cost us $500,000," he said.

Old folks and drifting diaries

"Old age is no place for sissies." – Bette Davis

Abraham Joshua Heschel said, "The test of a people is how it behaves towards the old."

If we in the western Jewish community were to take such a test, would we pass?

We have built structures of incredible enormity to house our "old folk" and simultaneously learned how to treat them like infantile basket weavers. We have determined an age – 65 – as the age of retirement and in doing so, sentenced our seniors to the role of third-arm appendages within our society. We idolize the nubile nature of youth, to the detriment of the nobility of age. We have consequently driven away the majestic lessons once learned from the wrinkled elegance of "the elder."

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

As the bathwater circles and takes with it our elders' wisdom and experience, unknowingly, or perhaps in full view, we have allowed them to slip away. Our mark is at best a passing grade.

Not so long ago, I sat with an 89-year-old retired doctor. He showed me his wondrous attitude toward life and we discussed his constant sense of surprise. With a rich focus, one that youth cannot have, the doctor talked about the afterlife. He told me his Christian patients, on their deathbed, usually said they had made peace with life after death, while his Jewish patients rarely, if ever, even mentioned their expectations of olam habah (the world to come).

I was honoured that he shared this thought with me, making me privy to an insight layered in years of experiences, ethical dilemmas, thought, curiosity and maturity. His consideration of his own demise was not that simple meandering of an old man or a young upstart. It was rich and fearless in its approach, and bathed in his memories of the thousands of hands he had held of dying men, and his deliberations as he pulled the sheets over their tired and relieved eyes.

The great American writer Ralph Waldo Emerson wrote, "As we grow old, the beauty steals inward." I know this to be true every Shabbat dinner when I ponder life with my beautiful 86-year-old Aunt Sylvia. Her eyes have not dimmed, and she beams with awareness and an uncanny understanding of reality and truth.

It is time for the age of retirement to be abolished so that seniors can evolve into a natural position of leadership, with their vast knowledge respected and consulted. This is commonplace in Asia. Old folks' homes should be reserved for orphaned seniors, not those with thriving families.

For those who require a moshav zikaynim (home for the aged), let us restructure our on-site programs to include committees to help Ethiopian Jews in Israel, to save our environment, free enslaved children of Africa and to fight AIDS.

Let us start homework clubs in these homes and create tutoring hours when students can visit and learn biology from our doctor or study Talmud and Judaism with very intelligent and creative women and men.

The possibilities are endless.

It is said that old age is not a lousy trick that God plays on us, but a time when we are finally free of the fears that enslaved us.

Seniors – fight for what is yours.

For those who are approaching these years, it might be prudent to consider a revolution in which we storm the castle of western thinking on "aging" so that we do not soon find ourselves gasping for breath as the bathwater carries us out to sea, drifting with our diaries filled with abandoned gems of life.

"I never saw such a large pile of books waiting to be read, as that on the desk of a 90-year-old man." – Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum

CARROT & PEANUT SALAD

This ingredients list may sound odd. Don't be alarmed at the amount of vinegar: the astringency of the dressing, against the oiliness of the nuts and, in turn, nutty sweetness of the carrots, is the whole point.

4 medium carrots, peeled
1/3 cup salted peanuts
2 tblsps. red wine vinegar
2 tblsps. peanut oil few drops sesame oil

Grate the carrots very coarsely. In a bowl, combine them with the peanuts and then add the remaining ingredients.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband Matt and I took the plunge last year and purchased a cottage in the Muskokas. We saved for a long time and it has been a dream come true for us.

We have very busy schedules. We both work hard and raise a family at the same time. We don't get much private time during the year and we hoped this cottage would be the answer for us as our two children are at camp most of the summer.

What we never thought about is all of our friends who want to come up for a weekend here and there, and we have even had requests from family to stay here when we are not using the cottage.

Maybe this is the way it's done in cottage country, but it's not the way we had envisioned it. I feel guilty about not wanting any visitors, but we really do need this time to ourselves. How do I get out of this gracefully without causing hurt feelings?

Cottage Couple

Dear Cottage Couple

Congratulations on the purchase of your new cottage. I'm sure you will find it your home away from home.

Don't let all your worries spoil the peace of what your cottage will bring to you. You are obviously the kind of people who give, or you would not have a problem saying to anyone, "Sorry not this time." Guilt is a strong emotion and you have to get past it.

Picture this: it's early morning and you and Matt are sitting on the dock together watching the morning mist on the lake. The loons are singing and your coffee cups are warming your hands. The sounds of nature are all around you and the stress of the city has left your shoulders. Now do you feel guilty that you said no to Joe and Jill last week? I think not.

Stop worrying and enjoy. You've waited a long time for this. Most of your friends will understand where you're coming from.

Possibly after a couple of seasons, you'll be ready for a weekend with some friends or family, but right now go ahead and relish your serenity. You've earned it.

Teen killed in Hezbollah attack

By AMOS HAREL AND URI ASH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Haviv Dadon, 16, was killed and four people were injured in Shlomi Sunday afternoon when Hezbollah anti-aircraft shells crashed into the Galilee town.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon convened top Israel Defence Forces (IDF) officials that night to discuss plans for Israel's response. Security sources said it would be "moderate," focusing mainly on diplomatic efforts to pressure the Syrians to restrain Hezbollah. They said Israel will refrain from overly harsh responses in the north to prevent unnecessary escalation.

The Israeli officials discussed "precisely directed" responses to Hezbollah aggression. Israel fired at suspected Hezbollah positions in southern Lebanon Sunday night.

Dadon, who was buried in his hometown cemetery Sunday night, was the first fatality from Hezbollah anti-aircraft fire on the northern border since IDF troops pulled out of southern Lebanon in May 2000.

Israel retaliates

The shelling came from Hezbollah anti-aircraft cannons on the Lebanon side of the northern border overlooking Shlomi. Seven shells were fired. Three landed in Shlomi, in the yard of a private home and at two sites on Harav Hazan Street, a preschool facility and a small plaza. Four shells exploded in the air and caused no injuries or property damage.

But the explosion in the plaza left Dadon dead. Another teenager, Yaron Fingleh, sustained moderate injuries, and three other pedestrians were hurt.

Hezbollah has threatened to continue attacking Israeli targets in the Shaba Farms area, and to respond to Israeli aircraft "encroachments" in Lebanon's airspace. Hezbollah considers the Shaba Farms area, which the Israelis call Har Dov, to be part of Lebanon

"Hezbollah is capable of responding to any attacks on Lebanese soil, and to Israeli provocation," Sheikh Nabil Kauk warned.

Speaking in southern Lebanon, he added: "We want Israeli planes to stop violating our sovereignty, and we'll make sure that such infringements will cost Israel's military command dearly."

Israel

Autopsy to be Probed

JERUSALEM — An Israeli committee will investigate an autopsy performed on a soldier. Health Minister Dan Naveh announced last week he would appoint a committee to look into the autopsy of Daniel Hiller, who died in service two years ago. The decision came after growing public criticism of state coroner Yehuda Hiss for allegedly misusing the organs of deceased soldiers for research purposes. The Israel Defence Forces said Hiller committed suicide, but his parents did not accept the army's findings. When the Defence Ministry eventually agreed to a new autopsy, they invited a pathologist from Denmark to perform it. According to his findings, major organs were taken out of the body in the earlier autopsy.

New Low-Cal Melon

JERUSALEM — Israeli scientists have developed a low-calorie watermelon. The new fruit contains 20 per cent to 40 per cent fewer calories than the normal variety. To create the diet melon, researchers at Hebrew University in Jerusalem isolated a variety that contains fructose, but not sucrose or glucose.

Pianist Plays Ramallah

RAMALLAH — Daniel Barenboim played a peace concert Aug. 2 in the West Bank city of Ramallah. Barenboim, a world-renowned pianist and conductor who grew up in Israel, played a program with a Palestinian pianist and his son. "I am sure that there are many people in the Israeli government who are not happy about my being here," he said. "But then, I am not happy about many things that they do."

World

Cubans on Birthright

NEW YORK — Ten young Cuban Jews went on a Birthright Israel trip last week, the first Cubans to go on the program that provides free trips to Israel for Jews aged 18 to 26 who have never been to Israel on an organized tour. A contingent of Canadian Jews was also on the 10-day trip. More than 40,000 Jews have gone on Birthright tours since 1999.

Wallenberg Recalled

NEW YORK — Groups around the world honoured Raoul Wallenberg on what would have been his 91st birthday last week. Ceremonies were held in seven cities for the Swedish diplomat, who is credited with having saved more than 30,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis. Wallenberg disappeared after the war and is believed to have died in a Soviet prison. The International Raoul Wallenberg Foundation organized the events at Wallenberg monuments in each city. They included a ceremony near the United Nations in New York and one in Budapest that honoured Wallenberg's translator.

Citizenship Revoked

NEW YORK — A U.S. judge has revoked the citizenship of an alleged Nazi concentration camp guard. U.S. District Court Judge Allyne Ross in New York ruled July 31 that Jakiw Palij, 79, lied on his 1949 visa application about having been an armed guard at the SS labour camp Trawniki. Palij claimed he had worked on his father's farm in Poland during the war.

Cemetery Desecrated

MANCHESTER — About 20 gravestones were damaged or toppled in a Jewish cemetery here last week on Monday night, a Jewish security organization said. It was the third Jewish cemetery to be desecrated in Britain this year.

Romanian Shoah Study

BUCHAREST — Romania's president has agreed to establish a Holocaust commission and develop a Holocaust program in Romanian schools. Ion Iliescu told Daniel Marianschin, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith International, who was travelling in Romania, that he would take steps to educate Romanians about the Shoah and that he was sending his education minister to Israel to develop a school curriculum. Romania will also create a special day of remembrance. Israel recently chastised Romania after Iliescu said the Holocaust wasn't unique to Jews and the government denied it occurred in Romania.

FSU Schools Deal

MOSCOW — The Jewish Agency for Israel and the Israeli government will jointly operate schools in the former Soviet Union. The deal announced last week affects 21,000 students in 223 schools. Slated to begin in September, it represents the first time JAFI is participating in formal education in the FSU.

City of Vancouver Gets Its First Eruv

VANCOUVER — The Jewish community here completed its first-ever eruv earlier this summer, allowing observant Jews to carry most items within its boundaries on Shabbat.

Using existing electrical or light poles and wires, Emily Singer, wife of Rabbi Ross Singer of Congregation Shaarey Tefilah, and Rabbi Avi Baumol of Congregation Schara Tzedeck, completed construction of the eruv, which others in the community had been working on for about 30 years.

Richmond, a Vancouver suburb, is the only other Jewish community in British Columbia with an eruv.

Singer told the Western Jewish Bulletin that prior to this summer, she had to hire a non-Jew to push her kids' strollers to shul on Shabbat, as the act, as well as carrying children, was forbidden without the eruv.

"We were almost always at home for Shabbat meals because people with small children couldn't get to each other's houses," she said. "Now I can take my kids to the park or bring things to shul for them to eat or drink."

Singer said a fundraising campaign will raise the estimated $10,000 per year needed for regular maintenance. "If 100 families pay $100 a year, then we're covered," she said. The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver paid $7,000 toward the cost of the eruv and there is money left over to last several months and an inspector will be paid to check the condition of the eruv each Friday, she said.

CJC confronts Trent University over professor

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has written a letter of complaint to Trent University president Bonnie Patterson requesting a meeting over an apparent exchange of e-mails between a Trent professor and a Web site that compiles links to articles about "Jewish power."

Michael Neumann

The correspondence is posted on Jewish Tribal Review's Web site and is attributed to Trent philosophy professor Michael Neumann as part of a discussion on anti-Semitism on Nov. 25, 2002.

The Jewish Tribal Review describes itself as a compilation of links to online articles "about Jewish and Zionist influence in popular culture, Jewish ethnocentrism, Jewish power, Jewish wealth, American Judeocentrism, and Jewish political lobbying."

In response to the question of whether the Jewish Tribal Review is anti-Semitic, Neumann apparently states, "I do, but I don't get bent out of shape about it."

The e-mail correspondence goes on to state, "My sole concern is indeed to help the Palestinians, and I try to play for keeps. I am not interested in the truth, or justice, or understanding, or anything else, except so far as it serves that purpose."

The Web site quotes Neumann as writing, "I should perhaps have said I am very interested in truth, justice and understanding, but right now I have far more interest in helping the Palestinians. I would use anything, including lies, injustice and obfuscation, to do so. If an effective strategy means that some truths about the Jews don't come to light, I don't care. If an effective strategy means encouraging reasonable anti-Semitism or reasonable hostility to Jews, I don't care. If it means encouraging vicious racist anti-Semitism, or the destruction of the State of Israel, I still don't care."

When it becomes clear in the e-mail exchange that the comments will be published, Neumann apparently writes, "When I said that I would do anything, including lie and obfuscate, to help the Palestinians, I meant the sort of thing that someone would mean who said he would do anything, including lie and obfuscate, to save the lives of his parents… It is a statement of commitment, not a strategic announcement… In fact, I do not lie or obfuscate in anything I write, because that would hurt the Palestinians."

> 'We should almost never take anti-Semitism seriously'
> — Neumann

In an e-mail interview with The CJN, Neumann says the material on the Jewish Tribal Review site was published against his express wishes.

Neumann goes on to say, "I repudiate everything attributed to me on that site, and – since I refuse to read the material – will not even comment on its authenticity. I have never voluntarily had anything to do with their Web pages, and consider their site among the most ingenious, insidious and distastefully anti-Semitic enterprises around."

The correspondence apparently began when the Jewish Tribal Review webmaster sent a note to Neumann, praising his article titled "What is Anti-semitism," which appeared in the June 4, 2002 edition of the left-wing Internet magazine, Counterpunch. (See "Professor's e-mail raises concerns of intimidation," CJN, Feb. 13.)

In the Counterpunch article, "What is Anti-semitism," Neumann argues that anti-Semitism and anti-Semitic acts are given too much attention and says they are particularly unimportant to the Israeli-Palestine conflict. He writes that "we should almost never take anti-Semitism seriously, and maybe we should have some fun with it."

In the e-mail interview with The CJN, Neumann wrote that "as someone who lost relatives to Hitler's camps, all anti-Semitism bothers me… At this point, however, the condition of the Palestinians, and the crimes committed against them in my name as a Jew, bother me far more. I do not believe that the Palestinian cause can be helped by 'vicious racist anti-Semitism,' by which I mean hostility directed against Jews for what they are rather than for what any of them do. I do believe that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will inflame anti-Semitism until it is resolved by a withdrawal of Israeli forces from the occupied territories."

Bonnie Patterson

CJC executive director Bernie Farber said in an interview that Neumann's apparent willingness in the Jewish Tribal Review to encourage what is described as "vicious, racist anti-Semitism" has moved beyond "what is considered proper political discourse."

Farber added that Neumann's apparent comments about lying in the name of anti-Semitism should be of grave concern to the faculty and administration of Trent and that students at Trent should not be subjected to Neumann's willingness to instrumentalize anti-Semitism.

"How can students have faith in a professor who appears to have embraced deception as a legitimate tool of influence?" Farber asked.

A Trent spokesperson said Patterson is away on holiday, but will follow up on the matter in early September.

Consul general Romem returns to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Meir Romem began his stint as Israel's consul general in Toronto almost four years ago, his main focus was on "selling" Israel, particularly its high-tech capabilities.

But with the onset of the current intifadah in September 2000, "everything changed," he said in a recent interview. "We had to emphasize the political aspect, the media aspect."

Romem, who is returning to Jerusalem at the end of this week to take a new position in the foreign ministry, said despite a change in Israel's situation, his message to the Jewish community here has always been "to strengthen the bond with Israel, to make aliyah, to visit Israel as much as possible, to invest in Israel, to buy Israeli products and to support us in every possible way."

Despite a certain amount of what he calls "discrimination against Israel" by the media – for example, use of the word militants instead of terrorists to describe suicide bombers – Romem says he had a good working relationship with the media during his time here. "It's somewhat frustrating, and sometimes you feel angry," he admitted.

But Romem felt he had to educate more than just the media. In his travels to Western Canada and the Northwest Territories, Romem was particularly disturbed by members of a small Jewish group in Vancouver who were publicly critical of Israel to a greater extent than he'd encountered elsewhere.

"I consider them traitors," he said. "It's not the time to criticize, because Israel is at war. Even in the United States, after Sept. 11, all the news organizations supported the government."

Commenting on last week's news that U.S. officials were considering reducing loan guarantees to Israel as a penalty for building a security fence, Romem said that would be counterproductive.

"[The Americans] should remember that [the fence] is part of our war against terrorism. It would be a mistake for the U.S. to weaken our position while we are fighting against terrorism."

Romem, who knows U.S. President George W. Bush personally from a stint as Israel's consul-general in Texas in the early 1990s, thinks the American president "has done a good job" and has demonstrated friendship towards Israel.

He would like to see the Canadian government follow America's lead. "The Canadian government is friendly, but they could be more friendly," he said, referring to criticism of Israel and to Canada's voting history at the United Nations.

Meir Romem

"Canada always tries to be neutral when it comes to us and the Arabs, as if the Canadian government forgets that Israel is a democracy and Canada is a democracy, so Canada has more in common with Israel than with the Arabs."

Romem also said Israel's democracy has faced more challenges than Canada's, because of hostility from its Arab neighbours. "It's easier for Canada to be a democratic country. It's much more difficult for Israel."

His biggest challenge here, he said, has been to fight anti-Israel propaganda. Particularly in the non-Jewish community, he said, people are ignorant about Israel.

In his role as consul general, Romem has spoken to many politicians and service clubs from Ontario to British Columbia, he said. He has also debated local Palestinians on radio and television, although making peace really needs to be done in Israel rather than here, he said.

Interacting with Canada's Jewish community, particularly in Toronto where he is based, has been a highlight for him. "The bond [with Israel] is strong, despite the problems. The Jewish organizations here are outstanding in their support of Israel and connection with Israel, even trying to promote tourism in difficult times when people were afraid to go to Israel. So many people here have kids in Israel, family in Israel, and the Jewish education here is also exemplary."

Since he joined Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1965, Romem has served in the United States and Stockholm. This was his first posting to Canada. He will be succeeded by Yaacov Brosh on Aug. 18.

Hoenlein to address UJA campaign launch

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Malcolm Hoenlein says he's a realist when it comes to Israel's future relationship with the Palestinians.

The executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, representing 55 national groups, will be the keynote speaker at the community launch of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Campaign 2004 on Aug. 20 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, when he will address "The Rocky Road Map to Peace" using a broad, global context.

"The optimistic approach," he told The CJN last week from his New York office, "would be to say that the Palestinians decide they'll live up to their commitments and fulfil their obligations, that Israel will certainly do the same, and that that will move us into an era where Palestinians and Israelis will live side by side. That there won't be a need for a fence [although] there will be separation, and that they will be able to benefit one another. I think Israel has a great deal to offer the Palestinians. By working together, they both benefit.

"The pessimistic view is that Arafat remains in control, that this hudna [truce] is a sham, that we will see the resumption of violence maybe after months.

"The truth will be somewhere in between."

It will be a rocky path, he believes. He added that Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, who served for 40 years as deputy to PA President Yasser Arafat, has yet to prove himself. Although

Malcolm Hoenlein

Abbas appears to be a better alternative at this point, "we have to see that he's not Arafat with a nice suit of clothes," Hoenlein said.

"At some point he has to be prepared to challenge Arafat, Hamas and Hezbollah."

Incitement to violence in the Palestinian Authority has decreased, but it's not gone, said Hoenlein. In addition to eliminating it, there "has to be a time when they start talking about peace and the benefits of it. It's Israel's security and survival that's at stake."

Hoenlein is confident that Israel, even when scrutinized, measures up well in comparison to other countries. "To me our strongest weapon is the truth. Our job is to inform the media, to educate them about the challenges Israel faces, and in a broader way to support the war on terrorism and explain what is at stake for the people of the West."

Last week's news reports about the possibility of the United States cutting back loan guarantees to Israel as a penalty for building its security fence was "obviously a leak with the intended purpose of putting pressure on Israel," said Hoenlein.

The fence and the release of Palestinian prisoners are security issues, not political ones, he noted. Historically, he added, 50 per cent of the prisoners released by Israel in the past have been recidivists. "I think [the Israelis] know which prisoners they can release and which they can't."

He added that there "would be no fence if the Palestinians were reining in the terrorists and stopping the attacks." Confiscation of weapons and taking measures against weapons smugglers are "things [the Palestinians] are capable of doing and must do," he said.

Hoenlein said that in some cases Canada can be even more important than the United States, "because of its role as a neutral country, or an additional voice at the United Nations."

Hoenlein believes it's the role of the Diaspora Jewish community to counter pressure on Israel.

He also thinks it's important to foster "creative efforts to sustain our community," particularly when it comes to involving young people, although the Conference of Presidents itself is not involved in that type of effort. "[Young people] are not looking for fancy buildings. They want substance. They want it to be meaningful. That is a real challenge for us."

Spector dissects Mideast in new book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Review

In the 1990s, Norman Spector immersed himself in the Middle East, first as Canada's ambassador to Israel (1992-1995) and then, briefly, as publisher of The Jerusalem Post.

Spector's exposure to the region gave him a first-hand perspective of the Arab-Israeli conflict, a dispute he followed assiduously as a columnist after returning to Canada.

Originally carried by The Globe and Mail and other Canadian newspapers, these columns form the core of Chronicle of a War Foretold, published by Douglas & McIntyre.

The columns, which are introduced by bridging comments, are supplemented by a prologue in which he discusses his ambassadorship and Canada's policy in the Middle East.

Born and raised in Montreal, Spector was the first Jewish Canadian ambassador to Israel, a result of former prime minister Brian Mulroney's decision to break a barrier. As Spector, Mulroney's former chief of staff, puts it: "He had already sent an Irish Canadian as ambassador to Dublin. Now, with his strong links to the Jewish community, he wanted to show he rejected any suggestion of double loyalty, the unstated canard at External Affairs."

From the outset, Spector, who was also accredited as Canada's envoy to the Palestinian Authority, realized that he could be more useful by promoting commercial, scientific and cultural exchanges than by trying to cultivate peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Indeed, he left the peace process to the American envoy in Tel Aviv. "I abandoned any pretension that Canada could persuade the two peoples to beat their swords into ploughshares."

In Israel, Spector spent much of his time exploring its nooks and crannies. He discloses, in a jocular aside, that his "personal project" was finding the best hummus in the region. (He stumbled upon it at the Abu Yussuf restaurant in Haifa).

Due to his familiarity with Arabic, Spector, a bachelor, met a number of Palestinians while in Israel. One of them, a Palestinian woman with whom he had a romantic affair, told him that many Palestinians regard the Holocaust as "Zionist propaganda."

Delving into the Arab-Israeli dispute, the meat and potatoes of this interesting book, he claims that extremism is the root cause of the conflict, and explains why Canadians have "a unique problem" in understanding Israel's struggle with the Arabs.

Norman Spector

Spector writes that most Israelis would be prepared to make "significant concessions" to the Palestinians were they convinced of their sincerity to live in peace as neighbours.

He adds, "I have never met a Palestinian who believes that Jews have not stolen Palestinian lands and that, morally, Israel has a legitimate right to exist as a Jewish state in the Mideast."

Spector accuses Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, of having dodged his solemn commitment to resolve differences with Israel by peaceful means. He assigns part of the blame for this to the European Union and, to a lesser extent, Canada.

By his reckoning, Arafat walked away from an Israeli and U.S. offer for Palestinian statehood because he was loath to confront Islamic extremists.

In the same opinionated manner, Spector doubts whether peace is possible as long as Arafat and Ariel Sharon, Israel's current prime minister, are "at the helm."

As publisher of The Jerusalem Post, Spector tried to move its hard right editorial line closer to the centre. He learned that readers did not wish to be exposed to diverse viewpoints.

In the last chapter, he analyzes the first Gulf War and the Sept. 11 attacks.

Spector maintains that, in stopping short of toppling Saddam Hussein in 1991, the United States came off looking weak and irresolute in the Arab world. This encouraged Muslim radicals such as Osama bin Laden, he suggests.

Spector, who wrote Chronicle of a War Foretold before the second American invasion of Iraq this past March, comes out in favour here of such a pre-emptive strike.

At the very least, he notes, the reordering of Iraq may stabilize the international system and facilitate a resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. He could yet be right.

Romania and the Holocaust

The current Romanian government has had a serious problem coming to terms with the Holocaust. Observers may be forgiven for thinking that Romania is labouring under a delusion regarding the terrible events of World War II.

On June 13, shortly after Romania signed an agreement allowing the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., to study Romanian archives relating to the Holocaust, Romania's ministry of public information claimed that, "within the borders of Romania between 1940 and 1945, there was no Holocaust." Less than a month later, the country's president, Ion Illiescu, told the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz that "the Holocaust was not unique to the Jews."

The statements issued in Romania's name were factually misleading or simply wrong. First, Romania was indeed a Jewish killing ground. Second, with the possible exception of Gypsies, Jews were uniquely singled out by Nazi Germany for mass extermination. By so mangling the truth, Romania, inadvertently we assume, ventured into Holocaust denial. It it any wonder that Israel summoned the Romanian ambassador in Tel Aviv to the foreign ministry and informed her that Israel took a grave view of these egregious distortions of the historical truth?

Much to its credit, however, Romania recanted in both instances and promised to make amends. Bucharest acknowledged that Jews had, in fact, been murdered on Romania soil, and Illiescu said that he recognized "the uniqueness" of the Holocaust. As if to underline its inexplicable mistakes, Romania pledged to expand Holocaust education in Romanian universities and to establish a memorial day to commemorate the Shoah. These steps should have been taken long ago, but better late than never.

Romanians who study the Holocaust with an open mind will learn that Romania's wartime record was, to put it diplomatically, lamentable. Raoul Hilberg, the distinguished American historian, has written: "No other country, besides Germany, was involved in massacres of Jews on such a scale." Jean Ancel, an Israeli authority on the subject, has observed: "Romania was the only ally of Germany that had its own plan of destruction and used its own army to exterminate Jews."

Of 760,000 Jews in Romanian-controlled territories during World War II, 420,000 were killed. Romania pursued a ruthless anti-Semitic policy, as the former Romanian president, Emil Constantinescu, conceded in 1997: "Romanians participated with a criminal blindness in implementing the infamous Nazi project of the Final Solution." Romania's fascist leader, Ion Antonescu, permitted the Iron Guard militia to carry out the 1941 Jassy massacre. In Bucharest, months earlier, the Iron Guard perpetrated a pogrom of incalculable barbarity. Romanian troops, in league with Germany, slaughtered Jews in southern Ukraine, as University of Toronto historian Michael Marrus duly notes. And Transnistria became a death zone for thousands of Jews.

Romania has a lot to live down concerning its disgraceful behaviour during the Holocaust, but at least it is willing to step back from the brink and admit the error of its ways. – S.K.

Two sides not irreconcilable

Otto Baruch Rand's article ("Two sides of the story: reframing the Arab-Israeli conflict," CJN, June 26) presents ideas and facts that are acknowledged by moderates in both Israeli and Palestinian societies, usually behind closed doors. Thank you for publishing it.

The voices of moderation and accommodation are too easily drowned in the sea of angry rhetoric. That's a shame, because it makes one believe there are no moderates. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Many Palestinians fear and loathe the radicalization of their population. They will privately acknowledge that the right of return is a non-starter, and they will tell you "for your ears only" that they are culturally closer to Israeli Jews than they are to Saudi Muslims. Their grasp of history, both modern and ancient, is, as Rand points out, astonishingly different from ours, but the moderates don't care – they just want to get on with their lives. The same appears to be true for Israeli Jews: secular Jews fear and loathe zealotry's encroachment on humanistic, liberal ideals. According to the polls, the majority of Israelis would give up settlements for peace.

It is not surprising that the Palestinians and Israelis tell different stories and view the peace process differently. That doesn't mean that the two sides are irreconcilable. Sometimes just knowing that another's opinion differs, not because he or she is different, but simply because he or she is looking at the problem from a different point of view, is enough to disarm hostility.

Beth Shalom Ottawa clarifies

I would like to take this opportunity to clarify some misconceptions raised by rabbis Ginsburg and Price of the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ), on their recent letter to The CJN concerning Congregation Beth Shalom in Ottawa (Letters to the Editor, CJN, June 19).

The rabbis are correct when they say Beth Shalom had not submitted a formal application to join the UTJ. Our past president was communicating with the UTJ about the possibility of joining their organization. We could not formally apply before the membership of our congregation decided our future path. The synagogue's board was also discussing other options, including becoming independent, with no affiliation.

We are also not doing away with age-old customs. Our synagogue is an amalgamation of three Orthodox shuls in downtown Ottawa and our traditions are more than 100 years old. What we are attempting to do in the heart of the city is to bring our traditions into the 21st century.

I also want to reassure the UTJ and your readers that we fully complied with our constitution and that our members did not base our recent vote on any "false premise." We followed a two-staged, 11-month process for change, with each process requiring a minimum of $^2/_3$ majority. Our membership knew exactly what they were voting for at each stage. Each vote produced approximately the same result: 70 per cent in favour of change. Also, contrary to what the rabbis may have been told, Beth Shalom is not moving toward an egalitarian service.

In two Shabbats with mixed seating, we enjoyed two very moving and meaningful services with more than double the normal attendance. The participation was loud, the children were running around and everyone spoke favourably of the change. We look forward to seeing this continue.

Don't vote Liberal

As we approach a federal election, a group of Liberal MPs ("12 Liberal MPs, senators urge shift in Mideast policy," CJN, July 17) are beginning to feel the heat of their deafening silence on Liberal Middle East policy. They are seeing their traditional Jewish support slip away. I urge my Canadian Jewish brothers and sisters to punish the Liberals in the upcoming election and defeat this anti-Israel party. I, for one, would rather break both my hands than vote Liberal ever again.

More Liberal boondoggle

I am happy a group of Liberal MPs wish to change the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade's (DFAIT) Mideast policy ("12 Liberal MPs, senators urge shift in Mideast policy," CJN, July 17). But DFAIT is a government department supervised by a Liberal minister and run by civil servants. Civil servants don't dictate the policy. The government minister does. The prime minister does. And his cabinet does.

Submitting a brief to DFAIT – that is, to the civil servants – is not effective. The department doesn't make policy. If the 12 wise men really wanted to change the policy, they would have petitioned the prime minister to change the minister in charge, who would in turn have the prime minister in cabinet change it. The fact that they didn't do so is evidence of another Liberal boondoggle to convince Jewish voters that Mideast policy will change if the Liberals are re-elected. Are we that gullible?

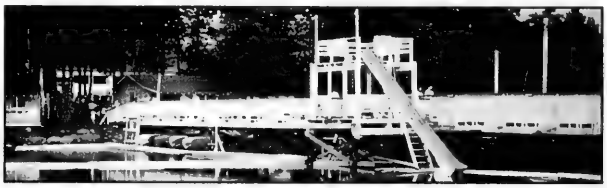
Camp Kadimah – Atlantic Jewry's best friend

By PAM MEDJUCK STEIN

A friend is someone who knows the song in your heart and sings it back to you when you forget how it goes. –Author unknown

Camp Kadimah in Lunenburg, N.S., is a magnet for Jewish kids across Canada, the United States and Israel. Although the number of Jewish children in the Atlantic provinces is dwindling, Kadimah magically draws in a full camper population from near and far. It offers everything anyone could want in a Jewish summer camp and simultaneously possesses all the traits of a best friend that nurtures Atlantic Jewish life.



The Camp Kadimah waterfront as it appeared in 1956.

The secret of the legendary charisma at Camp Kadimah is that it has the same elusive ingredients that have kept Jews alive and together throughout history. As a Toronto-based mother originally from the Maritimes, who has children there right now, I'm excited for the fun they'll have and the friends they'll make. As someone with beloved relatives and friends in Atlantic Canada, I am grateful they have Camp Kadimah as a best friend.

There are no Jewish day schools in Atlantic Canada. Each Atlantic camper lives from September through June as a member of a sparse minority in Saint John, Glace Bay, Corner Brook, Bathurst or even the biggest city, Halifax. Jewish life hinges on community, and Camp Kadimah gives Atlantic Jewish parents one good shot annually in the struggle against assimilation.

Growing up in the Maritimes was a blessing, but blessings are often mixed. The small Jewish community was close and active, with friendly neighbours and peaceful streets. The flip-side is that small towns lose their young and the Atlantic Jewish community has certainly lost many, including me. Solid Jewish values send Maritime teenagers to universities west of the St. Lawrence River and across the ocean in search of higher education and a Jewish social life. The conundrum remains: "How do I make a Jewish family for myself and still get to live in the Maritimes?" It's not easy.

I believe the laurels for the Atlantic Jewish community's strength and pride go directly to the sun-tanned brow of Camp Kadimah. Almost every Jew born east of Montreal since 1943 has slept in its cabins and sung in its dining hall. It's an unbelievable achievement. No one was ever turned away for lack of funds.

Every Jewish child received the same message at camp: "You are going to have more fun here than anywhere else in your life and you're going to be happy that you're a Jewish kid! You're going to be proud to be part of this very generation right here in the Maritimes, and you're going to build and protect the State of Israel!"

When Bruce Elman, currently the dean of the Faculty of Law at the University of Windsor, was camp director, he actually said, and I quote, "You're going to do it! You're going to love it! And you're going to do it again!"

Whatever it was, we did it, we loved it and we did it again and again and again.

A natural Atlantic pattern emerged. You started camp at the age of eight, knowing nothing about camp – here read in the word "life." Each summer you learned more about camp (life) and had more and more exciting and interesting times. Soon you were hooked on camp and hooked on your friends throughout the Atlantic provinces. You were hooked on your own community!

Camp thus became a central feature of your young life. Free of the busyness of school, Hebrew school and after-school activities, you saw life as a whole. You learned to socialize through the intimacy of cabin living. You cleaned both the cabin and the camp. You cheered your peers. You consoled your peers. You watched other kids struggle where you don't, and they watched you. You anticipated the rhythmic shift in camp routine for Shabbat, and you danced your cares away at the social on Saturday night. In six-week batches, you learned "community." The lifestyle was sound.

But healthy lifestyle is just the outer shell of Camp Kadimah. The heart and soul of Kadimah was, and is, vibrant Jewish identity. Generations of Kadimah counsellors have created a place centred on Jewish education. The staff of Maritime teens and adults infuse each summer with creative, thematic programs filled with fun, tradition and the Zionist values of Canadian Young Judaea. And through the years, the Atlantic community has built a self-perpetuating centre of Jewish education based on fun and pride, and God and Israel.

The goal of each Jewish community in all four Atlantic provinces was and is to get all its kids to camp. Kadimah was the only real chance for positive Jewish association. Camp had to be great. Sports had to be exciting and gratifying to all. Music had to be joyous and full of Yiddishkeit. Shabbat routine, Shabbat services and kashrut had to be unassailable. The kids had to be immersed in a feeling of warm togetherness, and it had to be in the context of Israel and Jewish tradition. I'll bet some people didn't even realize what was going on. But boy, did it work!

The themed Maccabiah games were always related to the development of Israel as a state. Team songs, cheers, plays and banners were based the theme of the year. One year, the Maccabiah theme was Israel's agricultural development. The White Team became the Redeemers of the Negev. Every cheer chanted about strength to clear swamps and bring water. Another year, the theme was human rights and the Yellow Team became "The Light unto Nations" with songs about anti-discrimination and universal love at the heart of the Zionist dream.

From the 1950s on, 16-year-olds would travel to Camp Biluim for Young Judaean leadership training, and then to Biluim Israel the following summer to see Israel for themselves. Most returned to Kadimah as staff for a few summers to give back what they could and to finally be on shmira! This camping cycle carried on and nurtured the lifeblood of Jewish Canada.

Now comes the flip-side of the mixed blessing. When I was born in 1957, there were 25 other Jewish babies born in Halifax alone and we travelled the Kadimah cycle together. Now, my sister's son in Halifax is one of maybe only two or three five-year-old Jewish boys in town. Travelling the cycle together is just not possible when numbers are so low.

In 2003, 80 per cent of the campers in the program that nourishes Atlantic Canada come "from away." It's fabulous. Kadimah alumni the world over now send their children and their friends' children to Nova Scotia year in and year out.

At first the influx of non-Maritimers was a worry. "Alumni kids were one thing, but people from beyond the Pale? Wow!" "Would the Maritime character be diluted?" "Isn't it the people who make camp so great? Haven't they always been Maritimers?" The true character of camp was becoming blurred in protectiveness and routine.

Steadily, the soul of Camp Kadimah shone through and it sang back the song its friends had temporarily forgotten. Alumni and staff realized that Jewish kids are Jewish kids. A full camp is what's important. A full camp is the minyan required to get with the program, and the camp's strength is the program, not the campers' postal codes.

Camp Kadimah is singing back to the shrinking Atlantic Jewish community. The song is bright and fresh, just as it always was. The Atlantic Jewish community needs that song dearly, and thanks to its years of friendship with camp, the song is there for everyone to enjoy!

In the 1940s, the campers and their parents possessed strong commitment to each other and to their Jewish identities. Their commitment has crystallized into a phenomenon of its own. Kadimah grabs each camper every summer with a zest that is truly hard to come by these days. That zest alone now attracts all the campers needed to fuel the annual Atlantic shot of Jewish joy and solidarity. Who would have thought that a summer camp could be the linchpin for the continuity of the Atlantic Jewish community?

Clockwise from top right, Kadimah staff in the late 1940s: Alice Newman Arnold, Shirlee Arron Medjuck, Helen Goldfarb Nathanson and the late Carol Silverman Feder.

In my day, we had pen pals from Yarmouth to St. John's. Today, Atlantic kids connect by e-mail all year long – with camp friends from across central Canada, the United States and Israel. Who would have thought that 250 big city kids would choose Barss Corner, Lunenburg County, N.S., for six weeks of fun, renewal and Maritime Jewish folksiness?

In my day, we knew we were considered to live in the back of beyond. Today, 250 campers come east to Kadimah, and students from central Canada are now filling the ranks of Dalhousie Jewish student events. Many come to study there as the result of a Maritime affinity nurtured at Kadimah, which represents the changeable and adaptable Jewish experience. It represents the global village. Maybe the Atlantic Jewish population will "rise again," to quote one former camper. Maybe Camp Kadimah does have the secret ingredient, an influence far beyond what the eye can see. Maybe I'm waxing into overkill. Home is where the heart is.

Camp Kadimah is 60 years old this summer. More power to it! Kol hakavod!… and hello to fellow campers out there somewhere!

Just for fun, visit Israel

Recently, I went to Israel to consult with colleagues, attend a conference, carry out research, and visit friends and family.

I did not go with a mission. I did not go to show support or do a mitzvah for Israel. I went for me. Totally selfishly.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

For two weeks, I walked, talked, read, laughed and ate. I recommend this form of travel.

Previous columns in this space have promoted trips to Israel to show our support and love of our Israeli family. I certainly recognize the importance of such claims and the very real need for tourists in Israel. Many taxi drivers noted the constancy of Christian visitors, which contrasted sharply with the erratic trips of North American Jews.

Thankfully, tourism has picked up a bit this summer. While there, I saw people on Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem. Visitors could also be seen in the Israel Museum. Sadly, though, other museums I visited remained empty. But at least there were people in the stores other than Israelis. Hotels are still empty during the week, but on weekends they fill up with Israelis who make a vacation – or family celebration – out of Shabbat. In other words, not enough of us are there. But it is not my intent to play the guilt game.

I want, quite simply, to share my joy at having been there, and to make the counter-claim that people should go to Israel for their own benefit. I have so much fun there. It is a wonderful country to visit, full of the contrasts introduced when an ancient heritage interfaces with a modern techno-society.

One trip took me to a neolithic archeological dig that was uncovering female figurines. An opposing worldview was presented at the Babylonian Heritage Center, which is dedicated to Israel's Iraqi community. Trips to Tel Aviv museums highlighted the history of the modern State of Israel, and my attendance at the Kolech Religious Women's Forum conference underscored modern Israeli intellectual and cultural diversity. Friends shared their experiences at the great spas or described hikes and nature trips. Daily, I was made aware of the contemporary textures of Israeli life. This is not an antiquated social experiment. Israel today is a country like all others – yet different.

Israel is a Jewish state, created for and by Jews. It resonates with our heritage, strength and endurance. It is a living testimony to our survival and to our relatedness. Going there recharges all my batteries. It extends all aspects of my Jewish existence. Hebrew and history come alive.

Obviously, there are many aspects of life there that infuriate, as war and peace, life and death, ricochet prominently through all interactions. Yet, the overriding experience is positive, enriching and just plain fun. Go for the sheer pleasure of it!

Talking to God in the ancient world

I have a suggestion for your late summer reading list that may not seem very seasonal, but, I assure you, will be astonishing.

James Kugel, professor of Hebrew literature at Harvard University and visiting professor of Bible studies at Bar-Ilan University, has written a number of books on biblical texts. His latest, The God of Old, is a very accessible analysis of how they reveal the ancients' perceptions of God. Kugel examines the texts and burrows into the minds of the people who left us their written accounts of their encounters with God. He delves into the ancient worldview of what God does, thinks, feels, and bestows on humankind.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I will describe two of Kugel's examples and leave you to delight in reading about the rest.

"We know a great deal about how God was conceived toward the end of the Biblical period," he writes, "since that way of thinking is in many ways still with us. This is the God inherited by later Judaism and early Christianity, and thus, in many ways, is the God of our religions today. But what of earlier times, what of the God of old?"

Kugel's first chapter deals with what he calls "the moment of confusion." It takes familiar stories, such as Moses at the burning bush, Abraham and the angels, Joshua's encounter with "the chief of the Lord's army" at Jericho and the announcement of Samson's coming birth to his parents, and compares them.

Each intertwines the identity of the heavenly messenger and God. Gradually, the two dissolve into one encounter with the divine. As Kugel points out, there is no lightning bolt that suddenly illuminates the scene. Each person eventually realizes that he or she is receiving a message from the deity.

Evidently, the appearance of angels and the messages from God they delivered were expected, and the people to whom they appear are, at first, confused – Kugel calls it "in a fog" – but they eventually catch on and usually fall on their faces or otherwise acknowledge that the encounter is divine.

In the biblical world, Kugel concludes, the spiritual and the physical realms had no fixed boundaries. The two overlapped, and biblical folk were not surprised at this possibility. Indeed, they saw it as perfectly reasonable.

Thus, Kugel writes: "There are not two realms in the Bible, this world and the other, the spiritual and the material – or rather, these two realms are not neatly segregated, but intersect constantly."

Leaping ahead to the period of the prophetic books, I give my second example of what you will find in the chapter "Not Searching for God."

In later biblical literature, Kugel writes, humans must beseech God to listen to their pleas and heed their calls. This is the God of Psalms, where the psalmist constantly asks for things – help – plenty of it and immediately, to paraphrase Kugel.

But in early narratives of the Bible, God does the talking before anyone else has a chance to speak.

"In much of the Hebrew Bible," Kugel states, "God simply buttonholes people and starts speaking." Abraham in Haran, Jacob at Bethel, Moses at the burning bush – God just starts right in with the mission he has mapped out for them. Nobody does much searching around, and only later do rabbinic and other texts try to put a human voice into the stories.

Mystics went to great lengths to "see" God, or at least to experience the divine. But in the biblical universe, God came looking for you. The prophets are perfect examples of these God-induced encounters. Most – Jonah and Moses being prime examples – try to wiggle out of the mission that God calls them to (of course, without success). They certainly weren't looking for a call, nor are they astonished beyond words, and they actively oppose their given tasks. But God doesn't take "no" for an answer.

As time went on, the idea of God became more remote theologically, so everyone had to go looking. But for the early characters of biblical texts, God could be nearby, talking with you one minute, siding with your army the next.

Why go to all this trouble to tease the essence out of ancient texts? To understand where we are, we should know where we came from. To understand our present-day theology of God, we should see clearly how we got here.

Read the book. You'll enjoy it. I promise.

Celebrating Yiddish

I'm willing to wager several zlotys that there are few, if any, hotel clerks and concierges in the world that speak only Yiddish. Yet, on the Internet, there is a Yiddish for Travellers Web site that includes a handful of helpful phrases including, "Es zenen faran leydike pletser far di nacht?" ("Are there any vacancies for tonight?").

I'm left wondering what sort of travel – besides time travel – might require tourists to master the mamaloshen for hailing cabs, finding restaurants and renting cars.

While Yiddish is still spoken among many older Jews and remains the first language in a number of haredi communities around the world, it is clearly not our people's pre-eminent language anymore. About four million people can still speak the language. Before the Holocaust, there were 11 million speakers.

My own personal relationship with Yiddish is limited. I learned very little Yiddish in Hebrew school (mostly some nonsense about Yossel going to the store, presumably to buy some herring). My parents spoke Yiddish at home occasionally – usually when they didn't want my sisters and me to know what they were saying. When I attended shul as a kid, I picked some up from the older guys' kiddush banter. I'll occasionally try to use some Yiddish slang with my friends, even though I probably get it wrong. I've taught my kids how to say "takkeh" and "ot a zoy," often in exchange for a cookie.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

I find Yiddish slang and insults to be almost poetic. And most of them only work in Yiddish. (Can you imagine insulting someone in English by wishing they would "grow like an onion"? It simply doesn't work.)

I've become a little more curious about Yiddish lately because of a local event. The 90th anniversary of the I.L. Peretz Folk School took place in Winnipeg on the August long weekend. More than 700 former students and staff gathered for a series of events designed to rekindle memories, share some Yiddish culture and rejoice in the legacy of a unique educational institution. According to a recent article in the Winnipeg Free Press, the secular, left-leaning Peretz school was for a time, in the 1930s, the largest Jewish day school on the continent and also launched North America's first Jewish kindergarten.

Demographics changed and interest in the school declined and, by the end of the 1970s, it merged with the Hebrew-based Talmud Torah which, like the Peretz School, was located in the city's storied north end. In 1997, the merged school ceased to exist when the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education brought together all its constituent schools under the banner of the Gray Academy of Jewish Education.

So while the Peretz school hasn't been around as a thriving, independent elementary school for many years, its contribution to the Winnipeg Jewish cultural landscape was significant, and it still flavours community life today. There are still Yiddish programs and concerts and, for the first time in years, the University of Manitoba is offering a course in Yiddish.

It seems, too, that the language is holding its own, even growing, around the world. There is now a summer Yiddish program at the Vilnius Yiddish Institute in Lithuania that attracts up to 80 participants annually, ranging in age from 15 to 70. Mendele, an online forum for Yiddish language and literature, has about 2,000 subscribers. Enter "Yiddish" into the Google search engine and you'll get 508,000 hits.

The fact remains, though, that at my age, I will likely not begin to learn Yiddish. My kids won't learn it either, unless our community schools suddenly decide it's a priority. But the dominance of Hebrew shouldn't deter us from finding ways to preserve and celebrate Yiddish. Its sounds and stories, slang and songs, convey a rich and colourful heritage – the texture of 1,000 years of European Jewish life. The organizers of Winnipeg's Peretz School anniversary celebrations, the co-ordinators of "Mendele," the academics studying the language and others who live the language are doing the world Jewish community an important service. We should wish them all a shaynem dank.

The Temple Mount: a Mideast flashpoint

The Temple Mount, a 35-acre rectangular compound in eastern Jerusalem, encompasses the Dome of the Rock shrine and the Al-Aqsa Mosque. It may well be the most contested piece of real estate in the world.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

An epicentre of religious and spiritual fervour, the Temple Mount is revered alike by Jews, Muslims and Christians. For Jews, it is the most sacred place in Judaism, the site of the First and Second temples – and, perhaps, the third. For Muslims, who refer to it as the Noble Sanctuary, it is the third holiest site in Islam. For Christian fundamentalists, it is where the third temple will be built, leading to the Second Coming.

Since the Six Day War, the Temple Mount has periodically touched off spasms of debate and bouts of violence:

• Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, warned last month that Israel's decision, since rescinded, to again permit Jews to visit the Temple Mount was an attempt to "encroach" upon an Arab property. (Jews were temporarily barred from the Temple Mount after the eruption of the second intifadah.)

• In 2002, a melée erupted when a group of messianic Jews, followers of the Temple Mount Faithful, tried to lay a cornerstone on its grounds in anticipation of the building of the third temple.

• The latest Palestinian uprising, which began in September 2000, was preceded by Ariel Sharon's provocative visit to the Temple Mount.

• The 1996 tunnel disturbances, which claimed the lives of some 80 Palestinians and 15 Israelis, were precipitated by unwarranted Muslim fears that Israel was trying to destroy the Dome of the Rock.

• In 1990, 21 Palestinians were killed by Israeli police after Palestinian rioters on the Temple Mount hurled rocks at Jews praying at the adjacent Western Wall.

• Alan Goodman, an American immigrant, touched off a week of violent protests in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in 1982 when he shot an Arab guarding the Dome of the Rock.

• Dennis Michael Rohan, an Australian tourist, caused a firestorm of anger and indignation in the Arab world in 1969 when he tried to burn down the Al Aqsa Mosque.

The Temple Mount also loomed large when Israel and the Palestinian Authority were in the throes of final status negotiations in 2000 and 2001. As rumours flew that former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and Arafat were close to reaching an agreement on the status of the Temple Mount, Muslim and Jewish clergy spoke out.

The mufti of Jerusalem decreed that Islamic law prohibits non-Muslim sovereignty over the Temple Mount. Israel's chief rabbis declared: "Jewish law absolutely prohibits handing over any sovereignty or ownership, indirectly or directly, to foreigners on the Temple Mount. Sovereignty belongs to the Jewish people."

Such were the emotions that the debate spilled over into the United States. The Zionist Organization of America, outraged by the remark by Israel's absorption minister that sovereignty over the Temple Mount could be renounced by Israel, ran ads in the Jewish press attacking her. "Israel must not surrender Judaism's Holiest Site, the Temple Mount," the ad thundered.

Agitated by suggestions that Israel might give up the Temple Mount as part of an end-of-conflict accord with the Palestinians, 30 Jewish communal leaders, including seven former chairmen of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, published an unprecedented appeal against relinquishing it.

As critics pointed out, the Conference's open letter smacked of a double standard, given its heretofore opposition to open criticism of Israel's policies.

In any event, a monolithic Jewish view concerning this incendiary issue does not exist. In December 2000, 101 U.S. rabbis, representing Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist streams, issued a statement disputing the notion of exclusive Jewish sovereignty over the Temple Mount for religious reasons.

Be that as it may, the Temple Mount proved to be one of the deal-breakers in Israel's attempt to reach an agreement with the Palestinians. With Israeli and Palestinian negotiators hunkered down in Taba in 2001 in an 11th hour effort to bridge the gaps in their respective positions, Barak's spokesperson ruled out any prospect for compromise on the Temple Mount. As she put it: "He [Barak] does not intend to sign any document that will transfer sovereignty over the Temple Mount to the Palestinians."

Israel captured the Temple Mount from Jordan on June 7, 1967, the third day of the Six Day War. Since the seventh century, with the exception of the Crusader period, the Temple Mount had been controlled by Muslims. Shortly after the conquest, Shlomo Goren, the Israeli army's chief chaplain, approached Uzi Narkiss, the general whose troops had wrested eastern Jerusalem from the Arabs. Fired up by messianic feelings, Rabbi Goren suggested that the Dome of the Rock be blown up so that the third temple could be built.

Narkiss would have none of that, according to an account published in The End of Days: Fundamentalism and the Struggle for the Temple Mount (The Free Press), a fine book by Gershom Gorenberg.

The rabbi persisted, saying Narkiss would go down in history if he listened to his advice. Finally, Narkiss said, "Rabbi, if you don't stop now, I'm taking you from here to jail." Rabbi Goren, stung by the rejoinder, left without another word.

In line with Narkiss' sentiments, Israel decided to leave the Temple Mount in Muslim hands. Moshe Dayan, the then defence minister, concluded that only the status quo could forestall a holy war.

Rabbi Goren struck again when he announced plans to hold prayer services on the Temple Mount. The Israeli government ordered security forces to direct Jewish worshippers from the Temple Mount to the Western Wall.

Israel's chief rabbis not only supported the edict, but warned Jews not to violate "the purity of this holy place" by treading on the Temple Mount. Since then, religious Jews, but not Jewish zealots, have respected this ruling. The latter are determined to raze the Dome of the Rock and the Al Aqsa Mosque and build a third temple on their ruins, and thus speed the way to redemption.

Gorenberg, an Israeli journalist, believes the majority of these extremists come from the old Israeli far right, "prophets of the anti-democratic, irredentist nationalism of the kind that had plagued Europe between the wars."

Within weeks of the Six Day War, Shabtai Ben-Dov, a Lehi veteran who espouses a theocratic system of government for Israel, filed a suit with the Supreme Court demanding that access to the Temple Mount be controlled by people "concerned with protecting it as a Jewish holy place." The court rejected his suit, just as it dismissed a suit by a Lehi ideologue, Yisrael Eldad, demanding the right to conduct Jewish prayers on the Temple Mount.

Israeli border police on the Temple Mount

Gorenberg suggests that Rabbi Dov Lior, a disciple of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, could be the most extreme Temple Mount messianist. He has claimed that all of Israel's problems are divine punishment for failing to build the third temple after the Six Day War.

Rabbi Lior and his acolytes pose a threat to Israel's stability. Several years ago, Carmi Gillon, the former director of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal intelligence agency, wrote an open letter to Barak warning that an attack by Jewish extremists on the Temple Mount could trigger an apocalyptic holy war.

It's clear that these extremists should not be underestimated.

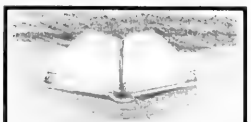
For Moshe, it was simple

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Moshe makes a speech that lasts for 23 chapters of the book of Dvarim, Deuteronomy, starting with Chapter 5 and ending with Chapter 28.

That is one long speech. In fact, pretty much the entire book of Deuteronomy is Moshe's last hurray – his last parting words of wisdom to his people before he departs this world.

The parshiot we read these weeks are all part of this long speech. Even the most famous Jewish prayer of all, the Shema, is part of this long speech. Moshe tells the people, "Listen Jewish people, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One." Moshe is speaking to us, the Jewish people, urging us to love God with all our hearts.

In the midst of his long speech, Moshe makes what must be a tongue-in-cheek comment – he can't really mean it. In Deuteronomy 10:12, Moshe encourages the Jewish people after having just told them about their failing years ago with the golden calf. He says to them "after all, my friends, what does God ask of you? All He asks is that you fear Him, go in His ways, love Him, serve Him and do all the Mitzvot." That's all.

The Talmud asks: "And Moshe, is fearing God so easy?" The Talmud is really expressing what we feel when we read this part of the Torah: is Moshe being sarcastic when he says that all God wants is for us to fear Him? That's not so easy for us of little faith who struggle with our physical selves that pull us away from spirituality and entice us toward the good life. Fear of God is way too heavy for us, and Moshe rubs it in by saying that all He wants is for us to fear Him.

And so the Talmud asks, "Is fearing God so easy?" To which it answers: "If you have the fear of God, it's easy. If you don't it's hard. For Moshe, it was easy".

Moshe is not being sarcastic. He is merely expressing the profound simplicity of what God wants from us. And for Moshe, it was profoundly simple. He figured, "If it's easy for me, why should it be so hard for you?

People often copy Moshe's example. Those who are passionately committed to their Jewish life can't understand how others are not. Those who are lovers of education cannot understand how others are not. We who are unequivocal supporters of Israel cannot understand those of bland support.

We become so self righteous that we find it difficult to understand how anyone could not feel the same as we do. And often, it is those who have overcome the challenges and attractions of other lifestyles and other uses of time and resources who are most guilty of expressing dismay at those who are still struggling and still being enticed.

In the end, Moshe is correct: all He demands of us is fear of Him and to walk in His ways. It's very simple, and if it's simple for Moshe, why shouldn't it be simple for us as well?

Wachtel interviews thought-provoking in print

Original Minds: Conversations with CBC Radio's Eleanor Wachtel, HarperFlamingoCanada, $34.95.

Since 1990, Eleanor Wachtel, the host of CBC Radio's Writers & Company, has interviewed some of the world's most esteemed and influential writers and thinkers. Original Minds preserves these conversations with 16 extraordinary men and women from the fields of art, science, economics, anthropology and social policy.

Wachtel is unfailingly well-informed, probing and thoughtful, able to extract the best from her sometimes diffident subjects. What emerges from these encounters is a spate of ideas, beliefs, impressions, preferences and prejudices, offered with candour, wit and spontaneity.

Surprisingly, nine of the 16 personalities turn out to be Jewish: critics and writers Harold Bloom, Susan Sontag and George Steiner; linguist/political activist Noam Chomsky; scientists and authors Jared Diamond and Oliver Sacks; urban planner and writer Jane Jacobs; writer, performer and director Jonathan Miller; and feminist and writer Gloria Steinem. Much of what they convey is of Jewish interest.

The other interviewees are filmmaker Bernardo Bertolucci, anthropologist Mary Douglas, novelists Arthur C. Clarke and Umberto Eco, primatologist Jane Goodall, Nobel Prize-winning Indian economist Amartya Sen and Nobel Peace Prize winner Desmond Tutu.

In an interview that was first broadcast in 1995, Steiner said he believes the decline of Christianity is inevitable "unless the Church, through some great act of honesty towards itself, begins saying out loud what it knows to be the truth: that Auschwitz grew out of its own teachings and out of 2,000 years of Jew hatred imbedded in the canonic books of Christianity."

Sacks, the eminent neurologist, perhaps best known for his book The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat (1985), recalled watching his mother light the Sabbath candles. He would imagine the Sabbath as a cosmic event, the peace of God settling on different star systems all over the universe. Eventually, he turned against the ultimate parental figure up in the sky, and from that time has never had any sense of a personal God. "On the other hand, God as nature, God as order, I think can inspire a mystical or religious feeling."

The formidable Harold Bloom regards himself as profoundly religious in temperament but heretical ever since he was a little boy. "Indeed, I remember when I was bar mitzvahed getting into terrible quarrels with the rabbis who were counselling me and educating me, and I even had the satisfaction of having one of them denounce me in Yiddish as one of the minim, the ancient Hebraic term which is used in the Talmud for the earliest Jewish Gnostic heretics."

Chomsky, who once worked as a Hebrew teacher, recalled the Friday evenings in his home that were set aside for reading Hebrew and Yiddish classics with his father. One of his favourite authors was Mendele Mocher Sforim. "[O]ne great regret is that I haven't had time to revisit those early experiences, and savour them for the point of view of a life in retrospect rather than prospect. Someday, I hope."

Finally, Diamond, an anthropologist and polymath, widely known for his epochal work Guns, Germs and Steel: The Fates of Human Societies (1997), said in his interview with Wachtel that from his analysis of the last 13,000 years, he learned human differences are not racial. All people have similar capacities. "It's just a matter of environment that some ended up differently, and if today they are given equal opportunity, they can move forward."

I listened to some of these interviews on the radio and learned much from them. It is helpful and replenishing to have them in printed form.

Jewish Life

Hebrew resources on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Ha'im atah rotzeh lilmod Ivrit?
Do you want to learn Hebrew?

It doesn't matter whether you're a student getting ready to return to school or you haven't practised Hebrew since your Cheder days. The Internet provides incredible resources for people who want to improve their Hebrew. Today, we are going to look at some online resources for people with beginners and intermediate Hebrew skills.

Whatever your level of Hebrew, your first stop should be at Yale University. The Yale Hebrew team has done an outstanding job explaining the history of the language along with an introduction to the 22-letter alphabet [http://www.library.yale.edu/cataloging/hebraicatea m/index.htm]. That Yale has such a good Hebrew Web site shouldn't come as a total surprise since the university required Hebrew as a basic curriculum course for freshmen in 1777. The essay, "How Hebrew Came to Yale" explains the special relationship that Rabbi Haim Isaac Carigal had on Yale's fifth president, Reverend Ezra Stiles. To this day, the seal of Yale University carries the Hebrew words "Urim" and "Tumim" [http://www.yalealumnimagazine.com/issues/01_03/seal.html].

Once you've mastered the alphabet and a few basic words, you're ready for the Starting with Aleph site. This delightful and sophisticated tutorial not only quizzes you about the spelling of some basic words, it also gives you an introduction to the mystical beauty of the Hebrew alphabet [http://ejemm.com/aleph/].

The National Center for the Hebrew Language is a U.S.-based organization whose motto is "Building Unity Among Jews Through Hebrew." The site offers a Word of the Day, a Word of the Week taken from that week's Torah portion, a literary corner and much more. And if you'd like to take your Hebrew to the next level, the site has an ulpan directory for classes across the continent [http://www.ivrit.org/].

Do you already have a pretty good Hebrew vocabulary but find Israeli conversation moves along too quickly? Then let an Australian site slow down time for you, literally. The anonymous creator of the site has taken some Israeli dialogue and slowed it down in order to make it easier to follow. Some of it sounds a bit distorted, but you'll get used to it after a few minutes and then you'll feel proud you were able to follow along [http://foundationstone. com.au/ListeningSkills.html].

Aleph-Bet on the Web is another excellent tutorial that tests your knowledge of Hebrew words and phrases. When Hebrew words flash onscreen, you are asked to type in the English equivalent. And when English appears, so does an onscreen Hebrew keyboard, where you can type in the proper Hebrew response [http://darkwing.u oregon.edu/~ylcflx/Aleph-Bet/].

They may not rival standard dictionaries in book form, but there are some pretty good online dictionaries. My Hebrew Dictionary gives you the Hebrew equivalent to common English words [http://www.words.co.il/]. I had mixed results with the Milon Morfix dictionary. It worked well when I typed in English and it responded with a Hebrew translation. Things didn't always go smoothly when I tried typing in Hebrew looking for the English equivalent [http://milon .morfix.co.il/]. (Please note that this Web site requires Hebrew fonts in order to display properly.)

The always amusing ZigZagWorld Web site is the best place to go to learn Hebrew through games and puzzles. If you are teaching the basics, then Aklah: the Jewish Children's Teaching Network is a great resource that has sound files for each Hebrew letter, printable flashcards, alphabet coloring pages and more [http://www.akhlah. com/Aleph_Bet/aleph-bet.asp].

It's one thing to be able to read and write the words. But you have to pronounce them correctly, too. Go to the Travlang site and you'll hear native Hebrew speakers tell you everything from "Ani rotseh liknot" (I'd like to buy) to "Eifo hasherutim?" (Where's the bathroom?") [http://makeashorterlink.com/?D26A24B65]. Travlang can also e-mail a Word of the Day in Hebrew. Just go to the Web site, fill out the form and check off the Hebrew box. And if you're interested in comparative languages, that same word is also available in about 100 other languages, including Esperanto, Chipewyan, Hawaiian and Xhosa.

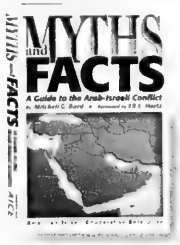
U.S. historically has assisted Arabs

MYTH:

American policy has always been hostile toward the Arabs.

FACT:

Arabs rarely acknowledge the American role in helping the Arab states achieve independence. The U.S. entry into World War I in 1917 and U.S. president Woodrow Wilson's stand for self-determination for all nations, which led to the establishment of the League of Nations in 1919, helped cause the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire and stimulate the move toward independence in the Arab world.



The Arabs have always asserted that Middle East policy must be a zero-sum game whereby support for their enemy, Israel, necessarily puts them at a disadvantage. Thus, Arab states have tried to force the United States to choose between support for Israel and themselves. But the Americans have usually refused to fall into this trap. The fact that they have a close alliance with Israel while maintaining good relations with several Arab states is proof the two are not incompatible.

The United States has long sought friendly relations with Arab leaders and has, at one time or another, been on good terms with most Arab states. In the 1930s, the discovery of oil led U.S. companies to become closely involved with Arab countries in the Gulf. In the 1950s, U.S. strategic objectives stimulated an effort to form an alliance with pro-western Arab states. Countries such as Iraq and Libya were friends of the United States before radical leaders took over those governments. Egypt, which was hostile toward the United States under Gamal Abdel-Nasser, shifted to the pro-western camp under Anwar Sadat.

Since World War II, the United States has poured economic and military assistance into the region and today is the principal backer of Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Egypt and the Gulf sheikdoms. Although the Arab states blamed the United States for their defeats in wars they initiated with Israel, the truth is that most of the belligerents had either been given or been offered American assistance at some time.

On occasion, the United States has appeared to condone Arab aggression against other Arabs. In 1963, for example, the Americans recognized the puppet regime set up by the Egyptians in Yemen. In 1991, while rolling back Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's aggression in the Gulf, the Bush administration looked the other way while Syria completed its annexation of Lebanon.

Reitzes resigns as president of Toronto UJA Federation

After 11 years at the helm of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Allan Reitzes is resigning as president.

Reitzes, 58, will stay in his current position until his replacement is found, and will remain with UJA Federation as a consultant, as well as pursuing other national and international Jewish communal activities, the organization announced.

Federation's executive committee will soon begin searching for his successor, who is expected to be in place by early 2004.

Reitzes first joined UJA Federation as budget director in 1982. Ten years later, he succeeded Steve Ain as the federation's senior professional.

Allan Reitzes

"I will leave my role as president with a combination of satisfaction for what has been achieved and appreciation for what remains to be done," Reitzes said in a statement. "

"I view my 11 years as the senior professional of this organization as a unique opportunity in one of North America's great Jewish communities that has an even greater future ahead."

"I've known Allan for nearly 20 years and I've always admired his devotion to professionalism, his sensitivity to the needs of all community members and the way in which he calmly steered us through many periods of crisis," said UJA Federation board chair Leslie Gales.

"Through Allan's intimate grasp of national and international Jewish issues, Toronto is among the Jewish world's most admired and globally connected communities."

A turning point for Iran

By JASON KENNEY

Iranian students are currently in the midst of the largest attempt to bring down the Iranian government since the Islamic Revolution of 1979. Should they be successful, the fall of the government would have the potential to vastly alter the political environment of the Middle East and would be a positive development in the region.

Guest Voice

Iran is the ideological nerve centre of the extremist Islamist movement. Since the fall of the Taliban in Afghanistan, Iran is the world's last remaining militant Islamic state. Its religious authorities – the mullahs and ayatollahs – hold ultimate control over the making and enforcing of laws, rendering impotent the country's elected officials. The country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Khameini, rules by religious law.

In the midst of this, the student protestors are calling for a western-style, liberal democratic state. The establishment of such a government in Iran would strike a serious, if not mortal blow to the worldwide radical Islamist movement. The fall of the central Islamist government would be a sign that those who aim to govern the entire world with Islamic law will not succeed.

The current regime in Iran poses the most serious obstacle to peace in the Middle East. By funding and hosting terrorist organizations like Hezbollah, Hamas and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, all of which are responsible for the murders of Israeli civilians and soldiers, the Iranian government is one of the principle obstacles to peace. The ship Karine-A was sent to the Palestinian Authority laden with 50 tons of weapons, rockets and explosives, courtesy of Iran. The flow of weapons and money to militant groups in the disputed territories provides a wellspring of support for the jihad against Israel. Eliminating this support would do more to advance real peace in the region than years of diplomatic talk.

In addition to its support for international terrorism against Israel and the West, the Iranian regime also poses a nuclear threat. Reports say representatives of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) were shocked by the degree to which Iran's nuclear program has developed. Just last year, former Iranian president Ali Akhbar Hashemi Rafsanjani noted that a single nuclear strike could easily destroy the entire State of Israel. The virulent anti-Israel and anti-American foreign policy of the current Iranian government, combined with the destructive capability of nuclear weapons, is a terrifying prospect.

Glimmer of hope in growing pro-democracy movement

The fall of the theocrats in Tehran would also put an end to the terrible human rights abuses by the ayatollahs. In Iran, women are not equal under the law and religious minorities are often persecuted. Women are stoned to death in the street after being convicted in kangaroo courts of infidelity, and dissidents are imprisoned and sometimes executed for speaking out. As the recent murder of Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi illustrates, being a journalist in Iran is a dangerous and sometimes life-threatening profession.

Despite the semblance of a democracy, ultimate power is held by mullahs and ayatollahs, not by elected officials. The religious supreme leader can overrule the president if he so chooses. This is not democracy.

Despite all this, there is a definite glimmer of hope in the growing pro-democracy movement. Protests led primarily by students in Tehran against the failed theocracy are spreading across the country, with analysts suggesting that the fall of the government may come much sooner than previously thought.

Western governments, including Canada's, should use political pressure to support Iran's pro-democracy movement. As it so often does, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's government has adopted a policy of "moral equivalence" between the masters of the Iranian terror state and the forces of democracy, refusing to comment on "internal" Iranian affairs while hosting ministers of the current regime in Ottawa. It is time for Canada to get off the fence and declare its support for democracy and human rights and an end to the sponsors of terrorist murder who have held the Iranian people captive for too long.

The vision of a free and prosperous Iran is inspirational. Such a change would be in the best interests of all parties. For Israel, it would mean the elimination of a serious existential threat. For Canada and the United States, it would mean a cessation of funding to dangerous terrorist organizations. For the Iranian people, it would mean an end to religious oppression and hardship. We should do all we can to help make this vision a reality.

Jason Kenney is the Canadian Alliance member of Parliament for Calgary Southeast, and the official opposition critic for Canada-United States relations.

Day school pioneer remembered on her yahrzeit

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

July 28, 26 Tammuz, was the first yahrzeit of Sarah (Steinhauer) Rumack, who in 1941 started the first Beth Hayeled (nursery) at the Brunswick Talmud Torah, a program that grew into Toronto's first Jewish day school.

"I don't know of any teacher who didn't have the highest regard for Sarah – as a teacher, and as a colleague who was always ready to assist in any way, and as a friend," said Eva Dessen, who was a close friend and colleague of Rumack and once taught at the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, the successor to that first day school.

Dessen, who delivered a eulogy at Rumack's unveiling, said Rumack started many programs that are still part of the Associated curriculum. "She was so creative and sincere. She wrote books and trained teachers, and her house was always open to teachers who came from Israel and would stay at her home until they could become established.

"Several generations of former students were privileged to receive not only academic excellence but the warmth and affection that became her hallmark."

Rumack was a student at the Brunswick Talmud Torah during World War II, when the supply of teachers from Europe was cut off, creating a shortage of teachers.

When she was 15, she and several other top students were selected to teach. She went to New York to take a Hebrew teachers' course at the Jewish Theological Seminary, since there was nothing similar in Canada.

Soon after graduation, she was asked by Levi Jacober, principal of the Brunswick Talmud Torah, to set up a day nursery program.

In an interview with The CJN in 1987, the year she retired, Rumack said she personally went calling on people who had young children to ask them to enrol the youngsters in the nursery program. She donated most of the materials for the first class and got her husband Oscar and friends to help with the work. She received $8 a week for teaching and training teachers.

Each year, an additional grade was added to the new day school. Rumack taught Grade 1 until her retirement from Associated more than four decades later.

In her own words, she summed up her philosophy of teaching. "The characteristics that make a good teacher are, someone who really cares – because a child senses it and responds – and you need a sense of humour, patience, an optimistic outlook and a good imagination."

The Rumacks had two children, Michael, a chazzan and bar/bat mitzvah teacher and Gail, an English teacher in Israel who has published a number of books on teaching. The teaching tradition has also carried on to another generation. Michael's daughter, Ruth, runs a tutoring service in Toronto.

TABS FOR WHEELCHAIRS: Toronto's Sharon Chapter of Jewish Women International of Canada has been gathering aluminum pop tabs for the past 10 years. Earlier this summer, the group succeeded in gathering 1 million tabs. With this massive pile of tabs, they provided a portion of the cost of a new wheelchair for Christene Rowntree of Bellwoods Centre for Community Living. This was the twelfth wheelchair provided by the chapter's project. Seen here with Rowntree is Evelyn Revivo of Sharon Chapter.

Yonit and Clara Nisan

Teen lives out her dream on March of the Living

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Clara Nisan didn't want her daughter Yonit to go on the March of the Living trip to Poland and Israel. As the daughter and granddaughter of Holocaust survivors, Clara knew how difficult the trip would be, and she wanted to protect her daughter from the things she would see there. But Yonit, who had been interested in her family's history since she was a youngster, was determined to go. She had been saving her money since Grade 7.

"It was something I had to do for myself," she said.

Clara has also been captivated by her family's history. Her father, Aharon, was one of six children. He, his mother and two of his siblings survived the Holocaust by escaping from the Bershad concentration camp in Transnistria, hiding first in the forest, and then in the homes of non-Jews.

Born in the Ukraine, Clara moved to Israel when she was a child. For as long as she can remember, she wanted to heal the sick and care for the elderly. It was only natural that she gravitated to the nursing profession, which put her in close contact with Holocaust survivors. When she was 19, she became a registered nurse.

Years later in Israel, when his mother was paralyzed by a stroke, Aharon, who did not trust doctors, refused to put her in a facility. With Clara's help, they cared for her at home until she died. Because his mother had saved him during the war, he wanted to do everything for her, Clara said.

"It was difficult for him to believe in God," she said. "Until the end, he couldn't accept what happened to his family." He died in 1997 from untreated diabetes.

In 1984, Clara moved to Canada with her husband and two young children, and she found a job at Baycrest, where half the residents are Holocaust survivors. Her knowledge of her family's history and of the war helped her understand the residents and change the daily routines that frightened them. Trapped by dementia and Alzheimer's, they were reliving their wartime memories.

One day, an elderly man screamed in the shower. Clara came running, saw the tattoo on the man's arm, and instantly understood. Disoriented from pneumonia, the man had mistaken the shower for the gas chambers. Clara coaxed him back to his room, reassured him and gave him a sponge bath instead.

Clara knew what Yonit would see at the camps, but she still allowed her to go on the March of the Living.

Yonit was also afraid of what she might see, but she wanted to go nevertheless. She went last May during her year off between high school and university, and was the oldest participant.

In Poland, she was shocked by what she saw.

"I collapsed on the curb, violently shaking as I choked on my sobs of anguish," she wrote in her diary after visiting Majdanek. "I was incapable of being touched, let alone receiving love from another human being. I was appalled and disgusted with myself for being a part of this so-called humanity."

Yonit said her grandfather rarely talked about his wartime experiences. Now she regrets she doesn't know more. After his death, she sat down with her paternal grandmother and spent four hours recording her grandmother's wartime experiences.

It's important to hear their stories, Yonit said. "We are the last generation that will be able to hear it."

The "new normal" at Baycrest

The past four months have been a trying time for all health care organizations. Dealing with the SARS alert at Baycrest was made much easier with the support of families, clients, volunteers, staff and the entire community. The true community spirit that Baycrest has come to rely on was one of our most important assets as we traveled this uncharted course. Thank you everyone!

We all must get used to a new way of thinking that requires us to be more aware of our own health and the impact it can have on our elderly.

Baycrest is now moving thoughtfully toward implementing "new normal" policies and eliminating the outbreak restrictions. We only began to do this when the Ministry of Health and Public Health gave us the all clear. Our recent experiences have taught us that we must move cautiously and always be on guard against any infectious disease. That is our responsibility to our clients, their families, and everyone.

For Baycrest, "new normal" means a permanent state of heightened vigilance to prevent or quickly contain future outbreaks.

This awareness, along with responsible behaviour, will help protect our most vulnerable population from infectious disease.

What will the "new normal" mean for you?

- Baycrest will eventually eliminate screening at the Khedive entrance and re-open other entrances. Anyone coming into Baycrest will then be asked to self-screen. This means that if you are feeling unwell (e.g. experiencing symptoms related to a respiratory infection), you should not enter Baycrest. This transition to self-screening will happen only when there are no more active SARS cases in Ontario.
- Hand washing is one of the best defences against the spread of infection. You will see signs and permanent hand washing stations at all entrances to reinforce healthy behaviours.
- Any client in our Hospital or Home who develops symptoms of an unidentified respiratory illness will be put on infection control precautions. As a result, you will probably see more health care staff at Baycrest in gloves, gowns and masks as part of this new heightened vigilance.
- New admissions to Baycrest will be screened for their admission history to other facilities.
- When booking a clinical appointment, you will be reminded that if you are experiencing symptoms that could relate to a respiratory illness or other infectious disease, you should not come to Baycrest.
- You may want to consider keeping your own Health Diary – a notebook that charts how you've been feeling, and lists the doctors or other health care specialists you have visited. This will be indispensable to you if Baycrest or Toronto Public Health need to ask you this information in the event of an outbreak.
- Baycrest is planning a healthy living campaign.
- Baycrest is developing a new Visitor Code that will reflect the responsibility all of us have to protect the Baycrest environment, our clients, staff and visitors, from future outbreaks.

Baycrest has a Rapid Response Plan for quickly re-establishing restrictive outbreak precautions.

Please continue to check the Baycrest Web site (www.baycrest.org) and family/visitor hotline at (416) 785-2500, ext. 4444, for updates on the transition to the "new normal".

With our community behind us, Baycrest continues to be not just a leader in care for aging adults, but a caring leader!

Winnipeg school reunion evokes loving memories

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jerry Spinak says although he was a real troublemaker during his years at the I.L. Peretz Folk School in the 1950s, he loved going there.

"I have wonderful memories of Peretz School," says the executive director of Proceid, a non-profit agency in Montreal. "It engendered in me a love of Yiddish which I carry with me to this day."

Spinak's warm sentiments were echoed by other alumni of Winnipeg's Peretz school, who met on the August long weekend to celebrate the school's 90th anniversary and to see old friends again. Almost half of the 700 attendees were from out of town, including many from the United States, and some from Europe and Israel.

Phillip Finkle, a pharmacist in Sudbury, remembered the dedication of his teachers in the 1940s. Toronto-based actress Candi Zell (class of '63) said her former classmates still feel a sense of family. Torontonian Brenda Honigman, who graduated in 1977, fondly remembered school plays and marching with Israeli flags for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

For retired Toronto public school teacher Paul Pascal, the Peretz school played an essential part in fostering his strong Jewish identity.

"Yiddish has remained a strong presence in my life," Pascal said. "It has helped me even in recent years in communicating with relatives from the former Soviet Union and translating the Yizkor Book from my mother's home shtetl."

When the Peretz School was started in 1913, it was one of the first Jewish day schools in North America. At its peak in the 1930s, it was the largest private Jewish school in Winnipeg. Enrolment began to decline in the 1970s along with a decline in the city's Jewish population.

In the early 1980s, the school was amalgamated with the rival Talmud Torah under a single board of Jewish education. The new school maintained a Yiddish track for interested students until the last Yiddish teacher, Aviva Katz, retired in the mid-1990s.

The idea for a 90th anniversary reunion was sparked by a series of smaller class reunions over the past 10 to 15 years.

A committee led by community volunteer Laurie Mainster planned the event for three years.

For the returning graduates, it was an emotional weekend that began with a Friday evening get-together featuring former principals Shimsho Heilik and Yoseph Bar-El and a Yiddish sing-a-long led by alumni Debbie and Jerry Maslowsky.

On Saturday evening, the graduates were treated to a gala concert featuring alumni and entertainers Herschel Fox and Aubrey Tadman from Los Angeles, Kenny Maslow from Las Vegas, Vicki Knight from Palm Springs, international opera star Norman Mittleman and an alumni choir directed by cantor Richard Yaffe.

Among those at the Peretz School reunion were siblings Candi Zell from Toronto, Michelle Zell-Kanter from Chicago and Rabbi Shawn Zell from New Jersey.

The weekend also included a visit to a new exhibit at the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada describing the influence Yiddish had in establishing a Jewish culture in Canada, a bus tour of Winnipeg's old Jewish North End, and a reception at the University of Manitoba in honour of the university's new Yiddish course.

But the highlight of the weekend was the reunion, which Spinak called a "real love-in."

Pascal pointed out an interesting observation his wife, Ruth Rohn, made at the event.

"[She] noted how many Peretz School graduates are in the helping professions – teachers, social workers, therapists," Pascal said. "I think that is directly connected to our Peretz school education and the values we imbibed there."

JNF Western Canada galas raise over $500,000

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A series of Jewish National Fund Negev galas in four western Canadian cities in June raised more than $500,000 in funds for JNF projects in Israel.

Winnipeg-based Rami Kleinmann, who has been the JNF shaliach to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for three years, said about 1,500 people attended the annual event in Winnipeg and about 500 attended the yearly galas in both Calgary and Edmonton. Saskatoon's first gala drew about 150.

"The JNF has not been that active in this region," says Suzanne Kaplan, president of the Saskatoon Jewish community, which numbers about 200 families.

"Rami wanted to get something going here. He helped out a lot, as did Lior and Keren-Or Bachar from our Arevim program." (The Arevim program sends young Israeli couples on yearlong contracts to help smaller Jewish communities across Canada.)

The money raised in Saskatoon and Calgary has been earmarked for the new Ilanot Park, named in memory of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon and his fellow crew members who died in the Columbia space shuttle disaster.

For the Edmonton gala, the JNF honoured businessman, lawyer and philanthropist Howard Starkman and his wife, Esther, a well-known community activist in the field of education. Funds from the Edmonton gala will go toward establishing the Esther and Howard Starkman Ilanot Science Literary Centre.

In Winnipeg, the JNF honoured Rev. John Howson, the Canadian national director of Bridges for Peace, an international evangelical Christian organization that raises money for projects that support needy Jews in Israel and the former Soviet Union.

The Winnipeg gala raised money for the creation of the John Howson Education Wing at the Asper Family Community Centre in Ofakim, a development town in the western Negev.

The four galas, Kleinmann noted, drew the equivalent of more than 10 per cent of the Jewish populations of the four cities.

He also noted the growing support of non-Jews for JNF and other Jewish projects.

"The support isn't coming just from evangelical Christians. The business community is also putting its financial support behind Jewish and Israel-based projects," he said.

Pro-Israel think tank's reputation growing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

In just three years, the subscription list of an e-mailed compilation of news articles on Israel and the Middle East produced in Montreal has reached almost 22,500 people around the world.

Isranet Daily Briefing is a free service of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) published Mondays through Fridays. A French version is put out weekly. Both are also available by fax.

CIJR was founded 15 years ago during the first intifadah by Frederick Krantz, a Concordia University history professor. Krantz's goal was to establish an independent think-tank guided by academics who would bring their expertise on Middle East-related issues to the media and Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

CIJR, which receives no money from any Jewish organization and relies on donations from its members, hosts a major fundraising event every August. This year's event, to be held Aug. 19 at a private residence, will be a reception in honour of philanthropist Edward Winant, a founding member of CIJR. The guest speaker will be Itamar Marcus, director of the Israel-based Palestinian Media Watch.

> 'This is the only databank of its kind in Canada'

"By monitoring Palestinian newspapers, television and radio, Marcus has shown the world what the Palestinian Authority leadership is really saying to its people," Krantz said.

Although CIJR is clearly pro-Israel, Krantz said the content is "objective and fair." Journalists, he said, are especially appreciative of its service.

Every day, CIJR's tiny staff comb through a lengthy selection of Canadian, American, Israeli, Arab and other international newspapers, magazines, journals, wire services and government publications to produce a four-page briefing.

Most of the articles chosen are opinion or analytical pieces. Occasionally, CIJR runs an original piece. Krantz said he is proud that CIJR was the first Canadian information outlet to publish Victor Davis Hanson, whose byline is now seen regularly in major American newspapers.

Each Wednesday, the briefing consists of notable quotes and short takes of news stories. Sources from a recent edition included the Washington Post, Ha'aretz, Britain's Sky News, Agence France-Presse, the Globe and Mail and a White House press release.

Though the briefings are sent to 22,500 people, CIJR does not know how many people the news actually reaches. "We don't know how many other people Isranet is forwarded to," said Krantz.

CIJR also publishes a printed quarterly digest called Israfax in both English and French, which, like Isranet, consists of reprinted articles from a wide range of publications.

The organization also keeps on file thousands of articles related not only to the Middle East, but to Jewish affairs in general, which are available to the public. Its Web site (www.isranet.org) handles inquiries from around the world.

In addition to its publications and file-sharing, CIJR also organizes and sponsors events throughout Canada, such as lectures and rallies. Its membership and board come from across Canada and Israel, and its academic council includes professors from the United States. A recent addition to CIJR's board is Annette Paquot of Laval University.

"She saw our Isranet briefing and became interested in what we are doing, even though she is not Jewish," Krantz said. Paquot is now helping edit the French version.

All this work is accomplished with a staff consisting of assistant director Karen Lazar, who formerly worked for the Israeli consulate in Boston, an archivist (hired with a government grant), a part-time researcher and a secretary. Volunteers include Baruch Cohen, 84, a Romanian Holocaust survivor, who has helped CIJR since its inception.

CIJR is financially supported by the Winnipeg-based Asper Foundation, but Krantz said its contribution is modest and CIJR survives from paycheque to paycheque.

"We have no endowment. By the last week or two of our year, we have trouble paying our bills," he said.

With a little more money, Krantz would like to digitize CIJR's holdings and make them available on its Web site. Currently, they occupy a roomful of filing cabinets in its downtown office.

"This is the only databank of its kind in Canada and we are running out of space," Krantz said.

Krantz said he would also like to do more for students. CIJR currently offers seminars to university students on Jewish history and Israel and employs several students during the year. Krantz envisages a sort of "afternoon school" for college kids.

"We have found this age group does not know a lot about the modern history of Zionism," he said. "They just don't have the facts when it come to debating Arab and left-wing students. We want them to have the commitment to not be afraid of the truth."

But Krantz's biggest dream is to produce a high-quality Web magazine. Published quarterly, it would go beyond Middle East affairs to include the arts, culture, book reviews, fiction and politics. "This we would charge for," he said.

For information on the Aug. 19 reception, call CIJR in Montreal at 514-486-5544.

Third Camp Ogama reunion set for Sept.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Hail, hail, the gang's all here – and many of them will be at the Camp Ogama reunion.

On Sunday, Sept. 7, former campers and staff of Camp Ogama (now called Camp Winnebagoe) will gather at the camp to renew friendships and recall the wonderful summers they spent there.

"For me, this camp reunion is not so much a recapturing or reliving of a time past, but a connection with a time and place that was formative in my life," says Roby (Levene) Hochman, who is co-chairing the reunion with Ernie Rubenstein.

Rubenstein, a business consultant, was the camp truck driver from 1958 to 1963.

"Although I worked as the truck driver, I developed many close relationships. Many are still my friends today," he says.

Hochman, a speech language pathologist, attended Camp Ogama for five years, first as a camper in 1957 and later as a CIT (counsellor in training).

"It was a privilege of sorts, because I believe it was a camp where an important part of my life's journey began," Hochman says. "It was a camp where we first sowed the seeds of independence, and learned to take responsibility for ourselves and others.

"We learned to lead and to follow, to stand firm and to compromise. We learned to co-exist within our cabins, our units and the larger community of the camp. We learned about accepting and being accepted, and how it felt when we were neither."

Camp Ogama was established in 1947 by Samuel Verman as a boys' camp. Two years later, Dave Lieberman took over and made it co-ed. In 1958, brothers Joe and Morris Goldenberg bought the camp, and Joe became the sole owner in 1960. He operated it until 1971, when it was purchased by Jill and Ben Lustig and it became Camp Winnebagoe.

This is the third Camp Ogama reunion and the first to be held at the camp site. Two other reunions were held in Toronto in 1983 and 1993.

Rubenstein says many of his values evolved during the summers he spent at Camp Ogama.

"As staff members, we were approaching maturity, and shaping ourselves into the people we were choosing to be," Rubenstein says.

"We were in the company of a variety of challenging group of peers, including very memorable characters, like noted comedy writer Earl Pomerantz, who now lives in Los Angeles, who used to say that he couldn't tell the difference between the salmon and the ice cream served at camp – the salmon was melted and the ice cream had bones."

The reunion committee has arranged for buses to leave York Mills Collegiate the morning of the reunion and return the same day. Participants can also drive to the camp on Fox Lake near Huntsville, Ont.

The morning will begin with box breakfasts and a welcome and orientation. Participants can choose from a number of organized camp-wide activities throughout the day, and organizers promise to set aside ample time for socializing and reminiscing.

Vegetarian and kosher products will be available on request.

For reservations or information, e-mail ogamareunion3@rogers.com, or call Ernie Rubenstein at 416-484 -7078.

New Supreme Court justice hailed for judicial brilliance

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Canada's newest Supreme Court justice grew up on Montreal's storied St. Urbain Street, the heart of the old Jewish immigrant district, and graduated from Baron Byng High School, a Protestant school that had a high number of Jewish students who became very successful.

Morris Fish, 64, who took his seat on the highest court Aug. 5, is the younger son of the late Zlata Gruber and Aaron Fish, who came from an area in eastern Europe that has changed hands between Poland and Russia.

"He was an outstanding student and a good athlete, especially in basketball, but he was a normal boy," recalled his brother Abe Fish, a Toronto businessman.

"He made friends easily and always had a deep interest in people. And he always displayed very good judgment. That was an intrinsic quality he inherited from our parents."

Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler has been friends with Fish since they were law students at McGill University in the early 1960s. Reached in Jerusalem, Cotler called Fish's appointment "simply brilliant, an ideal appointment. He is an exemplary judge in every respect.

"He has all the qualities you could seek in a judge: a judicial temperament, integrity, fairness, a command of civil and criminal law."

Cotler remembers Fish as a distinguished debater in his university days, as well as an outstanding editor-in-chief of the McGill Daily. Fish helped support himself through university as a staff reporter for the Montreal Star from 1959-63. After graduating in law, he continued to write editorials until 1970.

Fish's flair for writing judgments has been traced back to his early career in journalism.

"Although Morris's background is more secular or cultural than religious, he has a good knowledge of Jewish history and culture, and he speaks a good Yiddish," Cotler said.

Fish has been to Israel and once visited with Cotler as part of an exchange program between Canadian and Israeli appellate judges.

He is a friend of Aharon Barak, chief justice of Israel's highest court, and former deputy chief Menachem Elon, Cotler said.

Fish and his wife the former Judy Chinks are longtime members of the Reconstructionist synagogue. Shul president Bram Rubinger said Fish attends High Holy Day services. "He usually has one of his grandchildren on his shoulders as they listen to the shofar being blown. He's a tall, imposing man with snow-white hair. He's hard to miss.

Morris Fish takes seat on top court

"He is committed to the synagogue as an institution, as a place to be affiliated with. He was supportive our our expansion [last year]. He does not look at us from a distance."

Fish has two daughters, Amy Budman, a health consultant, and Laura Goldin, a lawyer, and four young grandchildren.

Avi Morrow, Judy Fish's uncle, said what he respects most about Fish are his strong values and principles.

"A few years ago when I got a new passport, I sent it over to him to authenticate it. He called me up and said, 'I can't do that if I don't witness you signing it.'"

Morrow said Fish has a passion for language. "On my birthday, he gives me dictionaries and other books about words, and on his, I give him books with Jewish content."

Morrow plans to hold an exhibition of Fish's photography – another hobby – at an Old Montreal gallery this fall.

Fish was named to the Quebec Court of Appeal in 1989 by Brian Mulroney, after a criminal law career that included directing Montreal's legal aid bureau.

Ian Solloway, immediate past president of the Lord Reading Law Society, the association for Jewish lawyers and notaries in Quebec, hailed Fish's appointment as "fantastic" and "long overdue." Fish is only the second Jew on the nine-member High Court. The first was the late Bora Laskin, who was appointed in 1970 and was chief justice from 1973-84. Fish is also the first anglophone Quebecer named since 1954.

Solloway said Fish, who is a member of the society, has a "superb judicial intellect" and is a humanitarian. "His appointment has been universally acclaimed by the profession."

He called Fish "a well-spoken, well-rounded, remarkable human being."

As for whether Fish will bring a Jewish sensibility to his decisions, Solloway said, "He will bring all his life experiences to bear."

The Supreme Court is due to soon hear a case of a very Jewish nature. In April, the Supreme Court granted leave to B'nai Brith Canada to appeal a Quebec Court of Appeal ruling that prevents residents of a high-end condominium from erecting sukkot on their balconies. The Quebec court upheld the side of the condo corporation. B'nai Brith says the permanent injunction infringes on religious freedom.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy welcomed Fish's appointment as "a great source of pride to our community" and a benefit to Canada.

CJC Quebec region honorary vice-president Max Bernard, a lawyer who knows Fish personally, said he has "the qualities of understanding, caring and fairness that are the benchmarks of someone who is able to dispense true justice, in the noblest sense of the word, to all who come before him."

Bernard said Fish cannot help but be shaped by "the moral foundation" of Judaism. He sees those coming before him as "people, not just facts and figures... He does not apply the law in a technical way, but rather looks at whether justice is being done."

Fish, he said, is "very warm, down-to-earth."

Joseph Nuss, a colleague of Fish on the Court of Appeal since 1995, described Fish's decisions as exhibiting a "penetrating analysis of the issues, and clear reasoning written in an eloquent and elegant manner." His written French is also impeccable, honed during post-graduate studies at the University of Paris.

Criminal lawyer Raphael Schachter, who has known Fish professionally and personally for more than 35 years, was thrilled by the appointment of his old friend – and adversary.

"Morris is responsible for my spending many a sleepless night during those days when I was a prosecutor and he was a prominent defence attorney.

"There was never the need for a raised voice when Morris was your adversary. His style as a litigator was low-key, his demeanour gentlemanly, but when it came to matching wits and achieving bottom-line results, there were very few the equal of Morris."

Media getting tangled on security fence

Israel's security fence was the big news last week. And most of it was negative from Israel's perspective.

With the U.S. administration, ordinarily Israel's staunchest supporter, reportedly threatening to withhold or reduce loan guarantees to Israel over its continued construction of the fence, criticism in the media has been mounting.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Wall Street Journal, which is normally very supportive of Israel, said (in a July 31 editorial) that the security fence "which is being constructed well inside the borders of the West Bank... is incompatible with any realistic vision of a permanent settlement" – an argument also made by Marcus Gee in the Globe and Mail on the same day.

In its editorial, "Stumbling block on road to peace" (Aug. 5), the Toronto Star argued that Israel's "security barrier" should be dismantled. While the paper acknowledged that "Israel has every right to build a security fence, or wall, along its borders... it is a mistake to build the fence on land that might become part of a separate Palestinian state, or be controlled by the Palestinians."

The Star does raise a valid point that has been heard elsewhere, including within Israel: one may affirm Israel's right to build a security fence in general and still question precisely where the fence is being constructed.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon originally opposed the fence's construction, fearing a return to the undefendable June 4, 1967 armistice line. And in order to gain approval for the fence from the Israeli right, Sharon agreed to place it in disputed areas substantially east of the "Green Line" (which is often improperly referred to as Israel's border) in order to protect a number of settlements. This move has been controversial, and discussion and criticism in the media is certainly valid. Even Sharon said, during his July 29 meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush, that Israel would do what it can to minimize resulting hardships to the Palestinians.

But just because the fence's placement is controversial, it does not follow that the fence should, therefore, be dismantled. Instead of concluding, as the Star did, that "Bush should continue to pressure Sharon to dismantle the fence," the paper – to be fair – should insist that Bush pressure Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas to fulfil the key demand of the road map: to disarm and dismantle the Palestinian terrorist groups. It is these groups that necessitated Israel's construction of the fence in the first place, and the barrier is supported in principle by the overwhelming majority of Israelis.

It is essential that discussions of the security fence make the distinction between overarching principles – Israel's valid security requirements – and details like the exact location of the fence. This is the tactic taken by Shira Herzog in an opinion piece in the Globe and Mail (Aug. 5). While she raises substantial concerns about the fence's current configuration, Herzog concludes that "a fence along agreed-upon borders can increase confidence in a negotiated agreement."

The true stumbling block to peace is not a fence that can be moved or even dismantled. Rather, the real impediment to peace is the reason the fence is being built: Palestinian terrorism, which must be eliminated once and for all.

Paul Michaels is the director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

KOACH Web site wins award

The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism's KOACH Web site has received a Silver Trumpet award from the Publicity Club of Chicago (PCC).

The award, which was presented to the online communications program of the Conservative Movement's college-age organization, recognized the group's achievements in public relations.

Jonathan Lehrer of Lehrer Communications is the KOACH site's webmaster (its designer and manager). He is also the new co-president of PCC, along with Jill Stewart.

In applying for the award, KOACH had to demonstrate how the various features of its site (www.koach.org) implement its mission statement. The site is designed to provide information and advice to Conservative Jewish college students and their families; maintain a connection between students, their families, their home congregations and the community; create an online community among Jewish college students; become a way to increase participation in KOACH activities and programs; and provide resources to prospective students and their families.

The KOACH Web site features a monthly e-zine written and edited by students from across North America. Articles have dealt with a wide range of topics, including the Holocaust, the war in Iraq, Israel, substance abuse, the environment and Jewish travel opportunities. An online poll measures student opinions on a different topic every month. The site contains campus contact information, job opportunities, academic resources, information about Jewish holidays, Shabbat, kashrut and other topics, and lists programs and services available through KOACH, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and sister organizations.

For further information about the Web site or other KOACH activities, contact director Richard Moline at moline@uscj.org.

Lawrence Plaza: 50 years at the heart of a community

Lawrence Plaza, opened on ten acres in 1953, was Canada's first shopping plaza. Fifty years later, it's still thriving.

Harry Kichler is a vice-president of Steele Valley Developments, which together with partners, bought Lawrence Plaza in 1996, when its future was uncertain. There was talk of redeveloping it, maybe turning it into a mall.

The community though, wanted the plaza intact; and they won. For the future, Kichler sees Lawrence Plaza "at the heart of the community," as in the past. "Steele Valley is pleased and proud to manage it," he says.

Generations of kids have hung out in the donut shops and record stores. Generations of parents have done their weekly shopping here -- pausing to chat over coffee and pastry in United Bakers and other places, going from table to table to greet friends.

There have always been "anchor stores" which, by drawing large numbers of customers, encourage other businesses to move in and share the traffic flow. Some of you will recall Morgan's, the first of these -- where, in September 1962, stylish women's shoes were selling for $19.98 (no sales tax).

Today, Lawrence Plaza has one of the best Winners stores, The Shoe Company, a 24-hour Dominion, with a large kosher section, and a Shoppers Drug Mart open till midnight. These are the anchor stores of today.

Many of the current businesses, like Kleinberg Jewellery, have served two or three generations, as have doctors and other professionals. Kids attend the Roland & Romaine Dance School; and at Summit Karate; you see parents and kids together.

"What makes Lawrence Plaza work," Kichler believes, "is not one thing only, but the mix. We choose tenants that cater to the neighbourhood. The merchants know many of their customers by name. And where else but Lawrence Plaza can you go to Open Window Bakery and buy half a challah for Shabbos?"

Part of this mix is the neighbourhood itself. Just to the north is the Barbara Frum Library. Not far away are schools, houses of worship and community organizations. And while the Jewish presence has always been strong, the cultural mix is diverse.

From the beginning, Lawrence Plaza has seen the launch of many community projects. Many a charity drive owes its birth to informal talk over a cup of coffee.

There's plenty of walk-in trade. Mothers with strollers and kids in tow, youngsters looking for school supplies, oldsters who've left the car wars behind, can shop here without fighting traffic.

Thousands of families have grown to a second and third generation in this area. While many have left, young couples have moved in to take their places, raising families of their own. And as Kichler says, "it's people raising families in a neighbourhood, who keep it alive".

Opening Day 1953

Lawrence Plaza has always been easy to get to, with the Bathurst bus at the corner, the 401 a few blocks north, and the Yonge Street subway 20 minutes away. The Spadina subway has made it even more accessible.

In such a popular plaza, parking has sometimes been scarce. Someone once asked Kichler:

"Why did you buy it, when you saw how crowded the parking lot was?" Kichler replied: "We bought the plaza because the lot was crowded. People enjoy shopping at Lawrence Plaza."

Hearing from the experts:

Marilyn Pike M.A., Hearing Solutions Audiologist

Hearing loss is a gradual process. By the time some of our clients decide they should have their hearing tested, they don't realize how much they've relied on facial expressions to make their way through a conversation. The funny thing is, when they experience the difference the right hearing aid makes, the statement on their face says more than words ever could.

A hearing loss can be accompanied by feelings of frustration and isolation. But at Hearing Solutions, you'll feel empowered. We involve you throughout the entire process of testing and hearing aid evaluation, to educate you about your choices. So when it comes time to choose a solution, your decision will be an informed one.

One of our Registered Dispensing Audiologists will perform a comprehensive hearing assessment, and explain your test results. You'll learn exactly what you can expect from a hearing aid, and how it will improve the way you hear and understand speech.

Then we'll walk you through your choices, the different styles and advanced technologies in hearing, and how they meet your personal lifestyle and budget.

We'll even provide a 30-day trial with your hearing instrument, so you can experience for yourself how a hearing aid can improve your day-to-day activities. Don't wait to start the conversation... call us today to schedule a free hearing test & comprehensive consultation.

A life in bloom at the Bernard Betel Centre

"I'm getting well paid," jokes Allan Pryce, volunteer gardener at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. "I'm making 60 minutes per hour." Most mornings through the summer, Allan tends the Centre's outdoor beds of fiery red and delicate green.

Though he laughs about time, Allan, 80, knows how to make the most of every hour of a life miraculously spared from Auschwitz. "I was standing in front of the gas chamber," he says, then pauses. "I survived so many things."

In 1989, after losing his wife, he moved back to Toronto from North Bay to be near one of his two daughters. "I didn't want to stay by myself," he says. "Avodah, avodah [work, work]," is his motto. When he discovered the Betel Centre had opportunities for Meals on Wheels drivers, he came to volunteer – and quickly found many reasons to join.

"I socialize, meet people, attend seminars, day trips, and Tuesday morning lectures," he says. And then, there's his gardening. As the sun moves higher, Allan turns his attentions to his lush plants inside the Betel Centre. "I start everything off from seeds," he says, "divide the plants, take cuttings. There are plants in the office, library, craft room. Flowers make a big difference."

Longtime Centre employee Barbara Zigler agrees: "Everyone says it looks like magic. Allan's gift … makes our place just shine."

In North Bay, Allan took time from his paint and wallpaper business to volunteer with the Horticultural Society, helping line Main Street with 135 large hanging baskets. He also participated in rose shows with his prize-winning blooms.

Allan still attends flower shows. He also walks for an hour daily and is an accomplished chef, baking bagels and ginger snaps for friends and family. But he always finds time to give something back to the Betel Centre for the learning and companionship it's brought to his life.

"I'm here every day except Friday," Allan says, lovingly tending his plants. "This is my second home."

Brock's Jewish students put fun on the agenda

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

When Aaron Bronsteter left Thornhill to study at Brock University, he noted that there was virtually no Jewish life on the small-town campus.

Last November, the 21-year-old decided to start a club for fellow Jewish students at Brock, few though they are.

"Something like that didn't exist," said Bronsteter, who is going into his third year of an undergarduate degree in business communication. "I only knew one or two Jews on campus. I figured there were more."

BUJA founded last November

He said BUJU – short for Brock University Jews United, which was founded last November – has different aims than most Jewish student groups.

Because of growing anti-Jewish sentiment on many campuses, most Hillel organizations tend to focus on pro-Israel advocacy and responding to anti-Semitism, but "we're here to have fun," Bronsteter said.

Other than an anti-Zionist letter printed in the the Brock Press, the student newspaper, there has been virtually no confrontation between Muslim and Jewish students at the University, he said.

Calling the clashes between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students at Concordia University and York University " counterproductive," Bronsteter said BUJU has a positive working relationship with the Muslim Students Association.

"We set an example of how people should operate," he said.

He said BUJU's main goal is to provide a place for Jewish students to interact with each other.

So far, BUJU has hosted bagel lunches and bowling nights. These activities are open to everyone who wants to come.

While St. Catharines has only a small Jewish community, the nearby B'nai Israel Synagogue has embraced BUJU's 30 members by providing them with a place to hold programs and to pray on the High Holy Days.

Also helping the group has been Bill Chernin, the director of regional campus Jewish services for Canadian Jewish Congress. He provides financial support and programming ideas to Jewish students at the University of Guelph, the University of Waterloo, Wilfred Laurier University and Brock.

Members have come up with programs

Chernin drops in periodically to see how the groups are doing, and offers advice and resources.

When it comes to programming, he said, "the sillier, the more fun."

He recalls a backyard "pool party" he attended recently that used a kid's wading pool instead of a real one. Guests spent the afternoon running around shooting water guns at each other.

"It was a blast. It was the most fun program I've ever been to," Chernin said.

"The unexpected always leads to good times."

There are a number of programs in the works for the fall at Brock, he said, including a joint camping trip with Guelph and Waterloo's Jewish students, a theatre field trip to the Stratford or Shaw festivals, and a murder mystery night.

Chernin, who describes the Brock group as "very self-motivated" said members have come up with most of the programs themselves.

"They've really taken the bull by the horns," he said.

Half the Jewish students at Brock are from Toronto and have had to adjust to a non-Jewish lifestyle in St. Catharines.

"They're used to more Jewish content in their lives," said Chernin.

The main focus is on the social aspects, said 21-year-old kinesiology student Noah Cooper.

"It's a great opportunity for Jews to feel some sort of community there. It's nice to have a touch of home," he said.

Tomatoes: red, nutritious and yummy

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Tomatoes are so versatile that they taste great in sauces, in sandwiches or salads, and even in juice or soup. Low in calories, tomatoes are rich in dietary fibre, vitamin C, beta-carotene, potassium and iron.

They also contain significant amounts of lycopene, an effective anti-oxidant that has been linked in several scientific studies to lower cancer rates. By cooking tomatoes, you can actually enhances lycopene levels and their effects, because cooking breaks down a tomato's cell walls and makes the lycopene more available.

TOMATO CORN BREAD

1 large tomato, cored and halved crosswise
4 tbsp. unsalted butter
1 cup yellow cornmeal
1 cup unbleached all-purpose flour
½ cup freshly grated parmesan cheese
1 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
1 tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. dried basil
2 large eggs, slightly beaten
1 cup milk
¼ cup plain yogurt

Using your finger, push seeds and surrounding liquid out of the tomato. Dice it and set aside in a strainer to drain. Gently melt butter in a 10-inch cast-iron skillet and remove from heat.

Preheat oven to 400. In a large bowl, mix cornmeal, flour, cheese, sugar, baking powder, baking soda, salt, and herbs. In another bowl, blend eggs, milk, and yogurt. Pour melted butter into the liquid, but leave heavy coating of butter in pan.

Make a well in the dry mixture and add the liquid. Stir briskly to blend, then fold in diced tomato. Turn batter into buttered skillet and bake for 25 minutes, until surface is light golden. The top should resist gentle finger pressure. Let stand for 5 minutes, then slice and serve. Makes 8 servings.

NO-COOK TOMATO SAUCE WITH OLIVES & MOZZARELLA (dairy)

This no-bake recipe is a snap, but needs to be made at least one hour before serving to give flavours time to blend.

3 large tomatoes seeded and chopped.
2 to 3 tsp. garlic, minced
3 tbsp. sliced green onions
1½ tsp. oregano; dried
⅓ cup olive oil
2 tsp. sugar
⅔ cup black olives, pitted and sliced
6 oz mozzarella cheese; diced
½ lb. any kind of shell pasta parmesan cheese, optional
salt and pepper, optional

Combine tomatoes, garlic, green onions, oregano, olive oil, sugar, and olives in a large glass bowl. Mix gently to combine. Set tomato mixture aside for at least 30 minutes, or up to 2 hours. Just before serving, cook pasta and drain. Return cooked pasta to empty pot and pour tomato mixture over hot pasta. Add cheese and toss gently. Cover with lid for one minute to let cheese soften slightly. Uncover and season with salt and pepper if desired. Sprinkle with parmesan cheese, if desired. Serves 4. Recipe can be doubled or tripled.

TOMATO AND ONION PIZZA (pareve)

As a dinner, lunch, snack or appetizer, this simple recipe is guaranteed to become a family favourite.

1 lb. plum tomatoes
1 tbsp. oregano
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 lb. sweet onions sliced
2 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. garlic, minced
½ cup white wine
1 to 2 tsp. rosemary, dried
¼ cup black olives, minced
2 pre-made pizza crusts
fresh rosemary and /or oregano (optional)
olive oil

Preheat oven to 375. Wash tomatoes and cut into ⅓-inch slices. Set aside. Heat olive oil in sauté pan and cook onions and sugar together over medium heat for about five minutes. Add garlic, white wine and rosemary and reduce heat; cover and cook for about 10 minutes or until liquid is almost totally absorbed. Stir in chopped olives and immediately remove mixture from heat. Spread onion and olive mixture over pre-made pizza crust. Place tomato slices on top and brush with additional olive oil. Sprinkle top of pizza with oregano and bake for 10 minutes, or until pizza is hot throughout. Makes 2 pizzas. For extra flavour, decorate top with fresh oregano and/or rosemary just before baking.

90-year-old stays active teaching dance

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Irving Naftolin teaches dancing.

Naftolin, who will be 90 years old in October, is spry, articulate and has a clear memory of events past and present. He is enthusiastic about sharing his thoughts on staying youthful, his love of dancing and the tremendous benefits he gets from dancing and teaching others to dance.

He believes ballroom dancing builds confidence.

"Dancing is a means of expressing one's emotions through movement," he says in a 1990 book he wrote on ballroom dancing titled Step by Step by Step.

"Dancing is the oldest of the arts that needs no instrument, for the dancer's body is the instrument."

Naftolin's book was written for beginners and seniors. It contains a history of the dances, as well as instructions and diagrams for waltz, fox trot, rumba, cha cha, samba and other dances.

In an interview with Naftolin in his compact apartment in a veteran's residence, where the walls are covered with photographs and magazine cut-outs of ballroom dancers and people in his life, he said he began dancing at age 21.

Irving Naftolin with dance partner Bella Lokshiner

"I was shy, didn't have any girlfriends and joined the Brunswick YMHA at College Street in 1935 to exercise, socialize and to dance."

He said he became interested in ballroom dancing and went on to take private lessons "and I went dancing at least twice a week."

Naftolin attended Central Technical School for two years and worked as a tinsmith until he went to work for his brother Ben Naft in 1938 in the printing business. Naftolin retired in 1975.

He served in the Canadian Army from 1942 to 1946, and when he was discharged, he married Clara Levi. She died in 1977.

In 1980, Naftolin was selected to dance in a chorus line that performed at Harbourfront. He later began teaching ballroom dancing at Earl Bales Park and veterans' clubs, as well as the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and other venues. But Naftolin does more than dance. He believes keeping busy and active is the secret to remaining youthful.

Indeed, his posture and movements belie his age. He goes to the JCC twice a week and exercises at home every day. "I enjoy dancing at Mel Lastman Square every Sunday evening in July and August."

He said "memory is very important" to the effort of staying youthful. To keep his mind active, he has several archival scrapbooks into which he pastes stories and photos of interest from newspapers. He also writes in his diary every day and belongs to several clubs.

Naftolin has two sons, Edward and Richard, and three grandchildren.

Goldenberg new president of CUA

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Urologist Larry Goldenberg, the director of the Prostate Centre at Vancouver General Hospital, was recently installed as president of the Canadian Urological Association (CUA) in absentia at the association's annual general meeting at the Bonaventure Hotel in Montreal.

Goldenberg, a former Torontonian, required urgent surgery and was unable to attend the conference, so Andy Moore, a close friend and colleague, read his acceptance speech and accepted the medal of office on his behalf.

Goldenberg said that as CUA president, he will interact with other national specialty groups and co-ordinate educational activities with the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada. He will also correspond with heads of urological groups in other countries.

Goldenberg attended the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He graduated from the University of Toronto's medical school in 1978.

He did his residency at the University of British Columbia and was a winner of the Terry Fox Research Fellowship in cancer endocrinology in 1984, and was a fellow of the American College of Surgeons (FACS) in 2000. He is a professor in the department of surgery in the division of urology at UBC.

In 1999, Goldenberg received a $20 million donation from Vancouver's businessman Jim Pattison to set up a research centre for prostate cancer at Vancouver General Hospital.

"I am proud of the accomplishments of the scientific team that I have put together at the prostate centre in Vancouver. It is currently reputed to be one of the leading research centres in North America," Goldenberg said.

"My research involves the study of diagnostics, education, novel treatment approaches and outcomes in prostate cancer," he said, adding that he is heavily involved in national and international clinical trials.

Goldenberg is also leading a magnetic resonance imaging research team investigating the role of dynamic imaging and spectroscopy in treating prostate cancer.

Goldenberg is married to radiologist Paula Gordon. They have two sons, Adam, 16, and Mitchell, 14.

Visits to Temple Mount may resume soon: minister

Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Public Security Minister Tzachi Hanegbi told the Knesset House Committee Monday that he might order the Temple Mount reopened to visits by Jews within a week, even if the Waqf objects, Israel Radio reported Monday.

Hanegbi said Israel would wait another week for the agreement of the Waqf (Muslim religious trust) to visits by Jews. If consent was not forthcoming, he said he might anyway order the resumption of visits by Jews to the disputed site, Judaism's holiest.

Visits by groups of Jews and tourists to the compound, which contains the Al Aqsa mosque and the Dome of the Rock and is Islam's third holiest site, resumed several weeks back for the first time since the outbreak of the intifadah almost three years ago. After Arab leaders, including Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, warned that the renewal of visits would have dangerous consequences, the police, fearing violence, again barred them.

Likud MK stopped by police

On Aug. 7, Tisha b'Av, the day Jews traditionally mourn the destruction of the First and Second Temples, Likud MK Yehiel Hazan vowed to visit the site but was stopped by police. Officers had to physically block him from going up to the compound twice. The second time came after police spent half an hour explaining to him that he would be endangering himself as well as the people gathered to pray at the Western Wall, below the Temple Mount.

On the heels of Hazan's decision to visit the compound, the Waqf called on all Palestinians and Muslims in Israel to "protect the Mount from attempts of Jewish extremists to force their way into the compound."

The last Israeli poltician to visit the site was Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in September 2000, just prior to the beginning of the intifadah.

Israel fires on Hezbollah position

Israel Air Force (IAF) planes Sunday attacked the Hezbollah anti-aircraft cannon that fired the shells on Shlomi, destroying the Hezbollah positions.

Top IDF officers said that, although they do not want to see escalation, continued Hezbollah anti-aircraft attacks could provoke stiffer Israeli retaliation.

IDF warns of stiffer retaliation

Israeli security officials are checking claims that three Hezbollah men were killed on Friday by IDF fire carried out in retaliation against Hezbollah shelling and missile fire against Har Dov. Hezbollah did not report the loss of any of men.

IDF forces in the north remain on alert, with their status unaltered since the assassination of Hezbollah operative Ali Hussein Salah last week in Beirut. Hezbollah claimed Israel was responsible for this assassination, but Israel has not responded to the charges.

In recent weeks, 18 Israelis have been hurt in the north by Hezbollah attacks.

Politicians believe Sharon scandals will force Israeli PM to resign

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As he skillfully conducts negotiations with the Palestinians and enjoys widespread popularity, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon could be forced to resign over a string of financial scandals in which he and his sons are principal players.

Analysis

That, at least, is the view of many Israeli pundits and politicians, some of whom already are gearing up for a post-Sharon era.

The process has become more urgent since Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein announced his decision to leave office next January. Before he does, he is expected to issue a comprehensive report on the Sharon affairs.

Even if there is no criminal prosecution, Rubinstein's condemnation of Sharon's ethical conduct is likely to be so devastating that pressure will intensify on Sharon to resign, observers say.

Sharon and his sons have been named or investigated in four cases of suspected misdemeanour or felony:

• a mysterious loan from an Austrian bank;

• the so-called "Greek island affair," in which Sharon's son Gilad was paid huge sums of money by a leading Likud activist when Sharon was foreign minister and, later, a candidate for party leader;

• building permits for that same activist in the town of Lod; and

• the proposed rezoning of agricultural land in the centre of the country, where the Sharons have a second farm.

Criticism has grown over the past few weeks as Gilad Sharon twice invoked the right to remain silent under police interrogation.

Last December, Sharon fired Naomi Blumenthal, the deputy infrastructure minister, after she kept silent during an investigation of bribery allegations in the Likud party primaries.

The right to silence is not something to which elected officials should resort, Sharon declared at the time. Though Gilad Sharon does not hold public office, legal experts say his silence in affairs involving his father is tantamount to a public figure remaining silent.

Even Likud Knesset members were outraged at Sharon's perceived double standard.

"If the prime minister of Israel doesn't urge his sons to co-operate with the police, what will ordinary citizens say?" asked Michael Eitan, chairman of the Knesset's Law Committee.

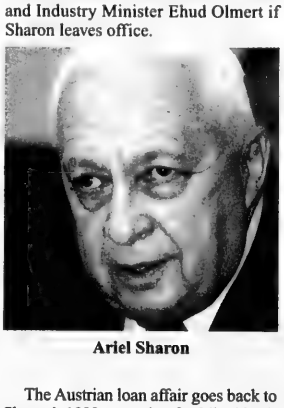
Rubinstein publicly castigated Gilad Sharon's silence and his refusal to hand over key documents, knowing that the prime minister's parliamentary immunity kept the family farm off-limits to police.

Pressure on Sharon escalated when Austrian law enforcement officials two weeks ago turned down an Israeli police request to pursue their inquiries in Vienna.

Coming just days after Israel and Austria restored diplomatic ties, the Austrian decision led to speculation that Sharon had agreed to restore ties if Austria blocked further investigation of the transfer of a controversial $1.49 million loan from Vienna's Bawag Bank to a Tel Aviv bank account run by the prime minister's sons.

Some leading politicians see a strong chance of Sharon being forced to resign. Shimon Peres, chairman of the Opposition Labor party, urged party colleagues to be ready for a change at the top.

In the Likud, two prime ministerial hopefuls – Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom – discussed a possible alliance to head off potential leadership bids by Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and Trade and Industry Minister Ehud Olmert if Sharon leaves office.



Ariel Sharon

The Austrian loan affair goes back to Sharon's 1999 campaign for Likud leadership. After the campaign, Sharon's elder son Omri, now a Knesset member, was questioned by police about whether he illegally used shell companies to raise campaign funds.

As part of an effort to return an illicit contribution from a company called Annex Research, Cyril Kern, a family friend based in South Africa, transferred $1.49 million through an Austrian bank to the Sharon brothers.

They then used the money as collateral for an Israeli bank loan to repay an earlier loan that had been used to repay Annex.

Police are investigating why the repayment process was so circuitous, whether Kern's loan could be considered a gift that officeholders are forbidden to accept, whether the source of the money really was Kern or whether it was the same people behind Annex Research, who Sharon was supposed to be paying back, and how Gilad Sharon was able to repay all the loans within the space of a few months.

Sharon has not addressed the issue beyond a news conference he gave during the last Knesset elections.

In the "Greek island" and Lod affairs, the common denominator is Likud activist and land developer David Appel.

In the late 1990s, Appel, who was trying to lease the Greek island of Patroklos for a tourism project, hired Gilad Sharon as a consultant. At the same time, he allegedly was seeking the intercession of Ariel Sharon – then the foreign minister – with Greek authorities.

Appel allegedly paid Gilad Sharon, a young economist with no experience in tourism, $25,000 a month for marketing, a down payment of $300,000 and a promise of $3 million if the deal went through, which it never did.

As prime minister, Sharon allegedly intervened to promote plans to develop areas to the east of Lod – where Appel owns land – despite objections by municipal and planning authorities. The move raised suspicions of a payoff.

In the land-zoning affair, Sharon was severely chastised by both the attorney general and the state comptroller for taking an active part in a 2002 decision that affected family-owned land in Moshav Kfar Malal, where Sharon was born.

Rubinstein closed the case on the grounds that there was no evidence of criminality, though he blasted Sharon's conduct.

In a signed editorial, Israel's Yediot Achronot newspaper suggested the Israeli right, which feels threatened by the road map peace plan, would not be overly saddened to see Sharon embroiled in legal complications as a result of the investigations.

Eitan Haber, former bureau chief to former Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and one of the paper's top journalists, wrote that Sharon's strongest supporters are now on the left because they know he is the only Israeli leader with sufficient standing to produce a peace agreement with the Palestinians and make it stick.

"If Sharon is truly bent on peace, on establishing a Palestinian state and uprooting Jewish settlements, there are many on the right who will dance on the rooftops if and when the attorney general decides to implicate Sharon in his sons' affairs," Haber wrote. "But for people on the left, it would be a tragedy of historic dimensions."

Sharon's resignation would not necessarily spark new elections. The Likud party could simply choose a new leader who would take over as prime minister if he is confirmed by a majority of the Knesset.

If so, that new leader could adopt policies toward the Palestinians that are very different from Sharon's, whose positions are too conciliatory for much of his party.

Birthright Israel drawing record numbers

It's turning out to be a record year for participation by young Jewish Canadians in the Birthright Israel program.

Between May and August, close to 1,600 participants will have taken part in the program, which provides Jews ages 18 to 26 who have never been to Israel on an organized tour with a free trip to the Jewish state. It's sponsored by leading philanthropists, Jewish federations and the government of Israel.

There were so many participants aboard the Aug. 6 Birthright flight from Toronto that El Al sent a chartered 747 to take 275 young people from Pearson International Airport to Tel Aviv. Approximately 200 were from Toronto, with the rest coming from Montreal, Winnipeg and the Atlantic provinces.

Ron Nayot, 24, a University of Western Ontario graduate, has witnessed first-hand the growth of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment on Canadian campuses.

He sees programs such as Birthright Israel as important tools in defending students against such rhetoric.

"I've been to Israel before several times. So Birthright, for me, is about education, rather than running around to see the sights of Israel," he says. "It's especially important that we, as young Jewish adults, are given the tools and taught the important information needed to defend Israel and counter ignorant arguments about Israel."

Samantha Gutstadt, 22, a recent graduate of Toronto's Ryerson University, hopes Birthright Israel will help her see the bigger picture when it comes to Judaism.

"I hope, and I've heard, that Birthright Israel gives people a true sense of belonging and connecting with something bigger," she says. "I think this trip will also provide me with a better understanding of where I come from as a Jew."

Adds Nayot, "I've been to Israel many times because my mother is Israeli, but [I've only experienced the country] on a superficial level. Birthright Israel gives me the chance to enjoy Israel on a spiritual level, and that's what I plan to do."

Dan Horowitz is senior communications co-ordinator at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. He is currently traveling with the Birthright participants.

British writer ignores pro-Israel letters

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A British newspaper columnist who admits he ignores pro-Israel letters to the editor if the writer has a Jewish name will not be punished, the country's media watchdog has decided.

Richard Ingrams, a columnist for the Observer, made the remark last month in a column criticizing Barbara Amiel, a journalist and the wife of Jerusalem Post proprietor Conrad Black.

"I have developed a habit when confronted by letters to the editor in support of the Israeli government to look at the signature to see if the writer has a Jewish name. If so, I tend not to read it," Ingrams wrote in his July 13 column.

The Observer received about 50 letters and e-mails in response to the column, including one from the Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization that represents most British Jews.

Neville Nagler, the director general of the board, called Ingrams' position "quite unacceptable."

"If a Jewish person chooses to support the Israeli government, this does not make his argument any less legitimate than a non-Jewish person's," Nagler wrote. "It is deeply worrying that a journalist of your paper is so willing to blind himself to one side of this sad conflict."

Another person who complained to the paper about the column pointed out that many Jews are highly critical of Israel.

"Ingrams would thus exclude names such as" Noam Chomsky, Susan Sontag and David Grossman – all fierce critics of Israeli policy – "from the public debate on Israel, on much the same ethnic principle as Jews were once blackballed from certain gentlemen's clubs," R.J. Chisholm wrote.

The Observer's own journalist employed to investigate reader complaints admitted the piece was "inflammatory" and "bigoted."

"I agree with a reader who pointed out that Ingrams' piece displayed such a degree of prejudice against Jews that it will be impossible ever again to take seriously anything he writes about Israel," the journalist, Stephen Pritchard, wrote on Aug. 3.

But the Press Complaints Commission, which received two formal complaints about the piece, has decided not to take action against Ingrams.

"It is clear there has been no breach of the code" governing newspapers, commission spokesperson Stephen Abell told JTA.

Complaints were filed on two grounds, he explained: accuracy and discrimination.

The column did not breach the accuracy clause because it was clearly labelled opinion rather than news, Abell said.

And the code's discrimination clause applies only to named individuals, not to groups, he said.

Ingrams "wasn't naming individuals, he was making a point about a group," Abell said.

The column might have been offensive, he said, but that is not a violation of newspaper guidelines.

"Matters of taste and offensiveness aren't covered by the code," he said.

Norman Lebrecht, a former columnist for Britain's Jewish Chronicle, supported the commission's decision.

He called it a matter of courtesy to read one's mail, adding, "If a columnist chooses to be discourteous, that isn't a matter for the Press Complaints Commission."

"There is no anti-Semitism in" Ingrams' refusal to read mail from Jews in support of Israel, Lebrecht said.

The reaction to the column stemmed from anxiety in the Jewish community, he said.

"There is an awful lot of nervousness in the community at the moment," Lebrecht said, adding the complaints "are a manifestation of that."

Jewish woman survived by marrying Nazi

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The Nazi Officer's Wife is a stunning documentary about a young Jewish woman who survived the Holocaust by adopting another person's identity and marrying a Nazi who was later drafted into the German army.

Edith Hahn was a law student in Vienna in 1938 and came from an assimilated Jewish family.

After the German annexation of Austria, she fled to Munich, where she passed herself off as an Aryan and married a member of the Nazi Party.

Hahn managed to survive the war this way, and with her daughter, immigrated to Israel, where she now lives, and where she wrote the memoir, upon which the film is based.

Incredibly, Hahn kept painstaking records of those days, including documents and photos, all of which have been used to bring her amazing story to life.

This remarkable film is narrated by actress Susan Sarandon, with additional readings by Julia Ormond.

After a successful screening at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival earlier this year, The Nazi Officer's Wife is now available on video and DVD through SMA Distribution in Mississauga, Ont.

Another important video, Israel: A Nation Is Born, was recently released on DVD. This six-part film chronicles the birth and development of the State of Israel and is narrated by the late Israeli diplomat and foreign minister Abba Eban.

The production gives a brilliant overview of the history of the Jewish state and provides first-hand testimony about the events surrounding the creation and growth of Israel through its first five decades. It includes interviews and rare archival footage of U.S. presidents Harry Truman and Richard Nixon, as well as such world leaders as Winston Churchill, Anwar Sadat, David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Rabin.

In a comment made at a time when the prospects for peace were a little brighter than they've been over the past few years, Eban himself describes the film as a "depiction of the turbulent and dramatic history of Israel, through the conflicts and tensions of five decades, climaxing in the brighter prospects of Arab-Israeli peace."

The DVD release includes a booklet that contains the New York Times' tribute to Eban after his death and a video tribute to him featuring his wife, former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger, and historian Arthur Schlesinger Jr. The DVD also includes subtitles in Hebrew, Russian and Spanish.

It is distributed in Canada by Morningstar Entertainment.

Magazine covers Canadian film industry

Jody Goldwasser and Mike Zembowski [Signature Photos]

In midtown Toronto, on a wooden patio deck, Jody Goldwasser and Jeff Kahane have set up two sofas, a wood kitchen table and two chairs, an ottoman and a glass coffee table supported by grey bricks, all under a black and white striped tent.

In the kitchen, there are beer bottles in the fruit basket and photos Kahane won't let me see. Back on the deck, a fan whirs, but the humid air is so heavy the breeze doesn't carry. The men lounge about as if they're at the beach. All that's missing is the sand.

These are the headquarters of Hollywood North, a new magazine for Canada's film and TV industry.

Along with four other buddies in the film and TV industry, Goldwasser, 26, Kahane, 34, and Mike Zembowski, 25, created Hollywood North because they didn't see anything like it on newsstands.

Goldwasser, the editor-in-chief, is quick to say what his magazine is not about. "We're not really interested in who's kissing who and that kind of stuff – the entertainment gossip part." Its focus is the industry itself: what's being filmed in the city, government tax credits for foreign filmmakers and filming technology. It's also the only Canadian magazine that publishes the Nielsen TV ratings.

Right now the magazine is published quarterly, but the group hopes that by January it will be coming out every month. They printed 200 copies of the first issue; for the second issue, they more than doubled that. Now their subscription list is up to 1,000 and they're sending copies to the United States.

The magazine has so far been produced on a shoestring budget. None of the writers or editors have been paid, and the advertising revenue has just barely covered production costs.

The editors all agree that the city's SARS-related economic slump, which has led to a slowdown in the entertainment business, has made it hard for the magazine to thrive. The first six months have been rough, they concede, and they predict it will take two years until Hollywood North starts making money.

Goldwasser says the "hurry up and wait" attitude on production sets gave him the idea for the magazine.

"I realized a lot of people are sitting around on the set not doing anything and we decided it was time to really do something about it. There's [American trade magazines] Variety and the Hollywood Reporter, but there's nothing like that in Canada, and that's how we started to develop it."

"It's a niche that needs to be filled," says Dan Resnick, a University of Toronto student who is currently writing a piece about films being shot on Toronto's three university campuses.

The group's biggest advantage is that almost all of them are in the film and TV industry. Goldwasser is an assistant director who has worked for "almost every major American distributor." Zembowski, the publisher, is a screenwriter and producer. Kahane is a graphic designer who does the t-shirts for Mandell Entertainment's summer tour and is the magazine's creative director. All of them met while working as DJs for Mandell Entertainment.

"The neat thing about it is that we have no magazine experience. None of us went to school for this, to learn about how to do magazines. None of us wanted to do magazines," says Goldwasser. Hollywood North is currently gearing up for its Toronto International Film Festival Issue.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

70 YEARS LATER, NOVEL RECALLS CHRISTIE PITS RIOT OF AUGUST 1933

Vancouver novelist-screenwriter Karen X. Tulchinsky is celebrating the release of a new novel, The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky. The work is set in Toronto around the turbulent time of the Christie Pits riot, which occurred on Aug. 16, 1933, 70 years ago this week.

At a softball game at Christie Pits, a group of boys known as the Swastika Club unfurled a huge swastika flag, setting off a race riot between Jewish and gentile youths. The riot was preceded by several skirmishes earlier that summer between Jewish youths and the Swastika Club who modelled themselves after Adolf Hitler's stormtroopers, and whose mission was to drive Jews and other "undesirables" from the beaches of Toronto.

The Five Books of Moses Lapinsky follows the life of Sonny Lapinsky, a young boy from a poor family, who dreams of becoming a professional boxer. When his younger brother Izzy is permanently injured in the Christie Pits riot, a rift forms between Sonny and his father, a rift that threatens to tear the family apart.

Tulchinsky is a recent graduate of Norman Jewison's prestigious Canadian Film Centre in Toronto. Her novel, Love Ruins Everything, was named one of the top 10 books of 1998 by the Bay Area Reporter.

She reads from her new novel at the Vancouver JCC, 950 West 41st Ave., on Thursday, Aug. 21, 7:30 p.m. The event is sponsored by Canada Council for the Arts and co-presented by the JCC's cultural arts department and Raincoast Books.

Medina Audition: Medina Theatre Ensemble seeks actors for a stage-reading of The Aching Heart of Samuel Kleinerman, a play by Marion Andre about the hard choices a Berlin family faces in the Holocaust era. Auditions by appointment only on Aug. 27 at the Lipa Green Bldg., 4600 Bathurst St., Room 423. Barbara, 416-486-6626.

Names in the News: During a recent visit to Israel, American actor Christopher Reeve visited several state-of-the-art institutions specializing in spinal injury and stem-cell research and complimented them on their work. Eight years after a catastrophic riding accident left him almost fully paralysed, Reeve – best known for his roles in four Superman movies – met Israelis with injuries similar to his own, and talked of how impressed he was with Israel's facilities for handicapped visitors.

Reeve also visited the Western Wall, the last remnant of the ancient Temple's retaining wall and the holiest site of Judaism. Mobbed by crowds of well-wishers, Reeve asked for some time alone so that he and his son Matthew could reflect quietly. Matthew placed hand-written notes into the wall on his father's behalf.

At a gala dinner at Jerusalem's King David Hotel, Minister of Tourism Binyamin Elon presented Reeve with a commemorative plaque, saying, "Your visit and your determination are an inspiration to Israelis, and I know they will also inspire Americans eager to visit the Holy Land."

Visits by celebrities like Reeve, Richard Gere and Whitney Houston are helping bring about a dramatic rise in tourism in recent months, Israeli tourism officials say.

O Borealia we stand on guard for thee

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Bet you didn't know:

We could be Borealians. That's right, our founding fathers, in their wisdom, once considered Borealia, Tuponia and Efisga before settling on Canada as their new country's name.

•Sandy McIntyre, proprietor of the goldmine near Timmins, Ont. that produced $230 million in gold, sold his stake in 1909 for $25 to buy liquor.

•Famed Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky was held in a Nova Scotia prison.

•Alert, Nunavut, is closer to Moscow than to Toronto.

•Superman's hometown was Toronto and Al Capone once cooled his heels in a maze of tunnels beneath Moose Jaw, Sask.

These and many other fun, informative facts make up True North Strange & Free [Reader's Digest Canada].

The 320-page book is well-illustrated and easy to read. Subjects range from history to medicine, the arts to sports and politics to crime.

It makes an excellent gift, especially for out-of-country guests.

Mission to Israel will focus on families

The upcoming Jewish National Fund of Canada solidarity mission to Israel will focus on meeting Israelis in their own communities.

"We are encouraging Jewish Canadians to show their support for Israelis during one of the most stressful and uncertain times in Israel's history," said Dr. Sharon Marcovitz Hart, chair of the mission to take place Sept. 4 to 11.

"Now, more than ever, Israelis need to know that Jews from around the world continue to stand together with them," she said.

Israeli families will welcome mission participants at Moshav Farran, a flourishing development in the Arava Valley of southern Israel and one of many communities developed by the Jewish National Fund.

"JNF has made a strong imprint on the land of Israel," said Marcovitz Hart.

"We have built water reservoirs and provided the essential infrastructure for new areas like Moshav Farran – land excavation, roads, water distribution and sewage systems.

"JNF also conducts agricultural research and development, to discover the ideal crops and farming techniques for local climatic conditions. It's fascinating to see how Israeli communities have developed in locations that were once considered too remote and uninhabitable."

In the Besor region and Kibbutz Magen, mission participants will witness the dramatic change in this part of the Negev since JNF started to develop the area in 1991 under its Action Plan Negev.

The mission will also include visits to the Old City of Jerusalem, Air Force Base Ramon, Mitzpe Ramon and the Ramon Crater.

Participants will travel through the ancient Spice Route, a desert route once used by caravans of camels to transport highly prized spices of the east to the ports of the Mediterranean coast.

As well, they will visit the Sapir Children Sculpture Centre, the Yair agricultural research and development station and the Centre for Special Studies.

The mission includes a return flight on El Al, luxury accommodations at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, most meals, deluxe tour buses and transfers. The trip departs from Toronto, and connections from major Canadian cities are available at reasonable cost. For further information, please contact the Jewish National Fund of Canada, in Toronto: 416-638-7200, in Montreal: 514-934-0313.

The Animal Sciences:

Toronto family doctor writes his first novel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ron Hotz

Ron Hotz is not your garden variety family doctor.

Hotz, 39, writes on the side, and his first novel, The Animal Sciences, was published recently by Coach House Books of Toronto.

A portrait of a group of friends and lovers, it is laced with quirky facts about science and medicine.

Or, as he explains,"It's really a romantic anatomy lesson that examines the remains of a relationship."

The Animal Sciences, said Hotz, a graduate of Forest Hill High School and York University, reflects his academic interests. "It bridges the fine arts, theatre, psychology and medicine. It's no surprise that the characters in the book include an artist, an actor and a doctor."

The book's genesis is quite clear.

"I was inspired to write it when I was a fine arts student at York University," said Hotz, the son of Jack and Tzafi Hotz. "My creative writing professor, Bruce Hunter, took an interest in my work and encouraged me to pursue it more fully."

Another source of inspiration was Evelyn Mitsui, his common-law partner and mother of their 18-month-old daughter, Hana.

"I used to read sections of the book to Hana once a week, like an old fashioned movie serial."

He compares The Animal Sciences to a laboratory in which he could experiment with writing and personal expression. "Over time, I came to realize that its themes were of interest to other people," he said.

"Mainly, the concept is that in nature, certain physical laws, such as primitive animal responses and chemical reactions, have a definite outcome. Hence the title. I tried to compare this with the 'laws' of human nature. Despite our best intentions, certain relationships have an inevitable outcome."

When he finished the unsolicited manuscript, he sent it to some 20 publishers. There were many rejection letters. "Most of the form letters wished me better luck elsewhere," said Hotz, who had no literary agent.

"And then Coach House Books responded. It had been floating in their slush pile for a while, but somehow it found its way to Alana Wilcox, my editor, and she was interested in working with me."

Wilcox, who received the manuscript last summer, was impressed.

"As soon as I started reading it, I knew I had found something really good," she observed. "It's so compelling. I love the characters, and I love Ron's way of telling anecdotes within a story. It's a really good novel – smart and fun and moving."

Hotz acknowledges that the manuscript required several "exhausting and ferocious edits."

Wilcox, more or less, concurs.

"We needed to do a little fine-tuning with the narrative and the logic. Any story with five characters who each have a particular relationship to every other character needs a fair bit of scrutiny to make sure that information is revealed consistently and in the best way to keep readers engrossed."

Last month's official launch of The Animal Sciences was truly symbolic of Hotz's multifaceted life as a doctor-cum-author.

"I had been awake the night before owing to a complicated series of obstetric calls," said Hotz, who earned a bachelor of medicine degree at McMaster University and who studied clinical psychology and family medicine at the University of Toronto, where he now also teaches.

On the day of the launch, just minutes before he was expected at a reading, he delivered a baby at Mount Sinai. Then, after reading an excerpt, he raced back to the hospital for another birth.

Hotz, who practises in the Bathurst and Lawrence area, believes medicine gives him an opportunity to better understand the physical and emotional aspects of the "person as a whole."

As he put it, "Writing simply documents these findings. It is also something I love to do."

Hotz is currently working on a new novel, and, not surprisingly, medicine is a big part of it.

"The story involves a couple that has lost a child. The father specializes in the advancing field of surgical robotics, and his wife is a veterinarian. Other characters include a Great Dane named Holly, a ghost and a pin-hole camera."

Looking ahead, he said, "If I can produce a good book I'm really proud of once every 10 years, I'll be happy. But I suppose my publisher might have some deadline issues."

VP wants to make Maccabi Canada a 'brand name'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As organizations go, Maccabi Canada has been pretty unique. Every four years, the Maccabiah Games are held in Israel; so the year before, the Canadian group is active in recruitment, fundraising, planning and marketing. Then there are the Pan Am Maccabi Games, also held every four years, and they provide a short burst of increased level of activity as well.

The rest of the time, well, if the organization isn't exactly dormant, it resembles an idling engine waiting to be put into gear.

Tom Bacher and the other members of the current Maccabi Canada executive want to change all that. As senior vice-president of the nation-wide organization, he's pushing a vision that would see Maccabi Canada increase its profile in the community, add staff, become a year-round operation and help address the key issue of youth assimilation.

Tom Bacher

Sports, of course, is the preferred method by which Maccabi Canada hopes to entice young people into closer ties with Israel and greater identification with the Jewish people.

"Our message is [we want] to develop Jewish identity through sports and athletics and strengthen bonds with Israel," Bacher said.

To this end, Maccabi Canada is developing a broader program of year-round activities and is inviting Maccabiah alumni to rekindle their ties to the organization to give it a broad-based, grassroots support system.

Maccabi Canada recently held an alumni picnic and is planning a November bowlathon as well as parlour meetings to keep interest in the organization alive, Bacher said.

Prior to the 2005 Games in Israel, Canadian athletes will be invited to a camp in Israel where they will tour the country, hear lectures, and enjoy various social activities. The Maccabi organization will provide something like the Birthright itinerary that has proven so successful for other young Jews, Bacher said. (Birthright is an all-expense-paid 10-day trip to Israel for first time visitors who range in age from 18 to 26.)

In the interim, Maccabi Canada is considering ongoing projects with educational, cultural and sports themes for athletes who hope to be part of the Maccabiah Games team. One example could be a Chanukah torch run from Montreal to Toronto, or meeting Israeli athletes in schools, Bacher said.

Other ideas being floated around include a national sports championship every year, sponsorship of Maccabi clubs, off-year training in Israel and coaching by Israelis (the trips to include educational and cultural events) to "get kids excited about Israel and sports," Bacher said.

"We need to make Maccabi Canada a brand name," he added.

Bacher, who played for the 1985 softball team and in subsequent Games served as one of the Canadian team's doctors, believes a trip to Israel in a sports environment can provide a lifetime link to the Jewish people.

"I became a much better supporter of Israel, emotionally and financially, due to participation in the Games," he said.

The Games, he continued, helped "bring young people back into the fold, even if they arrived in Israel with weak Jewish identities."

A key component of the new approach advocated by Bacher is to involve the many alumni who hold great memories of their time in Israel. Bacher figures 60 to 70 active volunteers can make the organization hum and provide the network to solicit the support of other alumni. If each alumnus gives $180 per year, Maccabi Canada can take a huge step towards raising the $4 million Bacher believes would help send a team of 300 or more athletes to the Games in Israel free of charge.

As the planning gets under way for the 2005 Games, expectations are that Canada will send as many as 400 people to Israel, including athletes, coaches and medical and administrative staff.

There's nothing like walking into the stadium in Israel during the opening ceremonies. "It was a phenomenal, life-changing experience for me," Bacher said.

Toronto youths gearing up for JCC Maccabi Games

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

In mid August, approximately 80 athletes representing the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) will venture to the Garden State of New Jersey in the quest for gold.

It's a confident group who will be hoping for a repeat performance. At last year's JCC Maccabi Games in Montreal, they took home more than 60 medals.

"I expect we'll do well again this year," says Grant Smith, one of the team's chief organizers. "We have a strong swim team, and that's where most of our medals came from last year."

The Maccabi Games, which run Aug. 17-22, bring together young athletes to compete in basketball, soccer, baseball, softball, swimming, tennis and golf.

Tenafly, N.J., along with Houston, Tex., and St. Louis, Mo., will host games this summer. More than 5,000 teens from across the United States, Canada, Israel, Mexico, Great Britain, Poland, Ukraine, and Venezuela will travel to the host communities to compete and take part in a variety of non-athletic Judaic activities.

Athletes were chosen after a series of tryouts. Bad weather, however, cut short the baseball and golf tryouts for the Toronto team.

Like the Olympics, the JCC Maccabi Games kick off with a colourful opening ceremony – in this case with each team marching into Continental Airlines Arena carrying banners of their country and signs identifying their city.

The Maccabi experience "is a good way to meet other Jewish kids," said Smith.

"One year, a kid from our baseball team met a girl from out of town, and ended up taking her to his prom."

Besides sports, participants, who range in age from 13 to 17, interact in athletic night social events and an Israeli-theme night.

In their spare time between events, athletes participate in trivia games, art projects and group challenges led by young Israelis who help share their love of Israel and Judaism.

"Learning about their religion is something valuable they can hold onto for a lifetime," Smith says.

In order to raise money for travelling expenses, the BJCC held a garage sale in July that raised an estimated $500. Another sale is scheduled for the end of the month, while other funds have been raised through athlete and team sponsorships.

Get Involved: Why not?

20 something

By JODI KOVITZ

Marla Bennett was a 24-year-old student who was killed in a terrorist bombing at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem a little over a year ago. Only two months before she died, Marla wrote an article for the Avi Chai Bookshelf, a project for participants of Birthright Israel, called "Jerusalem: no other place I'd rather be."

In the article, Marla shared her feelings about living in Israel. She wrote, "Here in Jerusalem, I've found a community of seekers: people who like me want to try living in another country, who want to know more about Judaism, people who are trying to figure out exactly what they want their lives to look like. The air is charged with our debates and discussions as we try to assimilate into our lives all that we've learned. Life here is magical."

Marla was clearly a woman who was hungry for knowledge and who lived with purpose. She chose to be involved in and know her community.

Though I did not know Marla, I feel lucky to have learned from her through her writing. Marla made me realize how lucky I am to belong to a community. She also made me recognize how incredibly rewarding it can be to engage myself in that community.

I find it interesting that what seems like a large proportion of Jewish 20-somethings are very reluctant to get involved in the community. Even more interesting is that many clearly identify themselves as Jews, both culturally and socially. They have been educated at Jewish institutions, their friends are Jewish, they live in Jewish communities and they even go to synagogue on the High Holy Days. Yet if you are throwing a party (even at the most liberal of Jewish institutions), or offering a Torah study session, this vast group of 20-somethings is nowhere to be found.

I wonder where this reluctance to get involved comes from. Is it a lack of interest? Is it perceived as "not cool" to participate in Jewish activities? Is it a fear of losing our independence somewhere in the process?

A friend recently provided insight on this issue. "We live in a very commercial world," she said. "Everyone is always trying to sell me something. The last thing that I want to be sold on is what to believe. For that reason, I am very reluctant to get involved."

Perhaps we might be more open to participating in events and programs if we trust that we will not have beliefs or thoughts pushed on us in any way. On the other hand, we might be happily surprised if we opened our minds a little more.

There are some great programs out there. On Sept. 7, from 12 p.m. to 6 p.m. in Toronto's Suydam Park in Forest Hill Village, you can enjoy live music, a market full of Israeli goods, a nargila café and more at Shuk in the Park. Every Wednesday, a Toronto rabbi runs a provocative educational series out of his home for people in their 20s on Jewish ethics. If you are interested, call Rabbi David Zauderer at 416-785-1107, ext. 302.

I have learned that we are very lucky to be part of a community. Personally, I have been extremely fulfilled through my involvement. I continue to welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

As the vice-president of Jewish education at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE), I am known for imposing two conditions on all Israel programs for teachers:

• The program must include a value-added factor unique to the Israeli experience. For example, participants studying a passage of the Bible in the place where a biblical event took place.

• The two-way bridge between Israel and the Diaspora must be fully respected. Both communities must be open to learning from each other.

I mention this in relation to a study seminar called Tikkun Olam I attended in July with a group of Toronto educators that was jointly sponsored by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), the Jewish Agency, Partnership 2000 and the BJE. We were in the Galil visiting the grave of Ilan Ramon, the Israeli astronaut who so tragically lost his life in February. He is buried at the famous Nahalal cemetery overlooking the beautiful Yizrael Valley.

As we talked of Ramon's life, his mission in space, and his death, it occurred to me he symbolized the two elements I mentioned above that are sine qua non for authentic Israeli-Diaspora dialogue. Ramon, zichrono livrachah, was the product of the best education Israel has to offer. He excelled in his studies and in his military career. He was the prototypical proud, intelligent, fit Israeli with deep-rooted values in the Zionist endeavour. When he was transferred to the United States to be part of the crew of NASA's space shuttle Columbia, he sought out Florida's Jewish community, gave his children a Jewish education and joined a synagogue – knowing that in the Diaspora, these are the ways one maintains a link with the Jewish people. As we all know, this secular Israeli requested kosher food for the flight, brought along a Torah and items related to the Shoah and spoke on the flight as both a Jew and an Israeli. He compromised no part of his complex identity while managing to show deep respect for all of us, Israelis and Diaspora Jews.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Community copes with blackout

By SHIRA HONIG and FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The blackout that brought much of Eastern North America to a standstill late last week had members of the Jewish community scrambling to find food for Shabbat and keep services and businesses running.

The power went off late last Thursday afternoon in the biggest power failure ever to hit the continent, affecting 50 million people in Ontario and the northeastern United States, including Jewish communities in Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, New York, Detroit and Cleveland.

As computers, subways, streetcars, refrigerators, freezers and air conditioners all came to a halt, people left work early and squeezed into jam-packed buses, drove through intersections without working traffic lights, or simply walked home in the blazing heat.

Until its electricity came back on Saturday afternoon at 5 p.m., power at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto came from emergency generators. According to its Web site, dentistry clinic and audiology services were cancelled, but the hospital and Apotex Centre were fully staffed, while some gas stoves, as well as refrigerators and steamers, were working. Staff gave residents lots of water, took them outside to keep them cool and served them cold food for Shabbat.

Like many others who observe Shabbat, Torontonians Karen and Ari Sitnik barbecued whatever food they had for themselves and their two sons, Dov, 6½ and Chaim, 5½ months.

"Whatever we have in the house, we'll use and that's it," Ari said Friday. "We have canned vegetables, tuna and whatever Karen can cook on the barbecue."

When their power came back on 4:45 p.m. Friday, "we were pretty much set by then," he said Sunday. "I put large containers of water in the freezer so if the power went again, we could use them as ice packs. And I made sure the wine was cold, because I like cold wine for kiddush."

Tel Aviv U establishes Mulroney chair

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tel Aviv University is establishing a chair in government named after Brian Mulroney, Canada's former prime minister.

Itamar Rabinovich, the university's president, was in Montreal last week to attend a meeting of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and met with Mulroney to discuss the details.

In an interview, Rabinovich said a holder has yet to be chosen for the chair, which will be activated next year.

"That's an academic decision," said Rabinovich, whose emphasis since becoming president in 1999 has been the development of new academic programs.

A Mideast scholar and former Israeli ambassador to the United States, Rabinovich said the university, which has an enrollment of some 27,000, is now placing greater emphasis on graduate studies and bio-medical subjects.

It is also offering, for the first time, master's degrees in diplomacy and conflict resolution and new courses in environmental studies and high-tech management.

As a result of the Palestinian uprising, the number of foreign students has dropped by half to 500, less than 20 of whom are Canadians, he said.

Rabinovich, the former head of the Dayan Center for Middle Eastern Studies, said a 20 per cent decrease in government allocations has forced him to cut costs. Last year's budget was $250 million (US).

"We need $270 million to operate with ease," he said, adding the university has no alternative but to develop private sources of income.

"In the last four years, we have raised $50 million a year from local and overseas donors. We would like to raise that sum to $60 million to $70 million."

As well, he said, the university needs to persuade the Israeli government that tuition for some professional graduate programs must be increased.

Rabinovich is not in the financial position to put up more buildings. "The campus is pretty much built up," he noted.

But the university, which has introduced an affirmative-action program for students in financial need, will be able to accept about 3,000 additional applications.

Rabinovich said he plans to retire in three years.

"We have term limits," he said.

Record Hate Sentence

TORONTO — Mississauga, Ont., resident Bradley Love, 44, was sentenced in the Newmarket, Ont., court to 18 months in jail last month after pleading guilty to 20 counts of wilfully promoting hatred for sending hateful letters about Muslims, Jews, East Asians, blacks and other groups to politicians and public figures. Among those receiving letters were Liberal MPs Judy Sgro and former immigration minister Elinor Caplan, as well as York Regional Police Chief Armand La Barge, Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and B'nai Brith Canada. It's the longest sentence ever in Canada for promoting hatred. Crown prosecutor Jaimie Klukach said Love's extensive criminal record, including convictions for assault with a weapon, intimidation and extortion, justified the heavy sentence, the York Region Era Banner reported. Love will also be on three years probation when he is released.

Israel

Uzi to be Replaced

JERUSALEM — Israel is phasing out its famous Uzi submachine-gun, as well as U.S.-made M-16s. The military is replacing both with a new gun that draws on lessons it has learned in the latest Palestinian intifadah. The new Tavor is shorter and lighter than the other two guns and has vents that prevent dust clogs, as well as sights that let a shooter aim with both eyes open. The first Tavors, made by Israel Military Industries, have already been issued to elite infantry units.

JAFI, WZO Cuts

JERUSALEM — About 850 workers at the Jewish Agency for Israel and World Zionist Organization have agreed to pay cuts from two to 17 per cent, and 50 staffers will be laid off. Overseas emissaries will also be cut by 10 per cent, Ha'aretz reported. The wage cuts will last at least two years.

Youth Threatens Sharon

JERUSALEM — Police briefly detained a Jewish youth from Hebron after he allegedly threatened to kill Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. He went to Sharon's Jerusalem residence Aug. 10 to post signs publicizing an event in Hebron's Jewish quarter. When approached, he allegedly told police: "I have no problem to assassinate Sharon." He later fled, but was caught, questioned, and released on bail.

World

Gibson Film Criticized

NEW YORK — Mel Gibson's new film will fuel anti-Semitism if it is released without changes, the Anti-Defamation League said last week after attending a preview screening in Houston Aug. 8. The ADL said The Passion blames Jews for Jesus' crucifixion and relies on sinister medieval stereotypes and historical errors. It said Christians and Jews have worked for years to negate the teachings about Jewish complicity in Jesus' death that are featured in the film. Gibson is a member of a Roman Catholic sect that repudiates Vatican teachings clearing the Jews of the charge of deicide.

Nazi Fashion Nixed

HONG KONG — A top Hong Kong fashion chain has pulled a new line of Nazi-themed clothing after protests. I.T. Ltd., the company that owns the chain, put up Nazi banners and flags in its stores last weekend to advertise a new line of clothes with swastikas and other Nazi symbols, Reuters reported. When Israel, Germany and some consumers complained, the company removed the flags but kept selling the clothing, until the Israeli Consulate in Hong Kong protested last week.

Apology for Cartoon

SYDNEY — The editor of two leading Australian newspapers apologized last week for a recent cartoon comparing the Israel's security fence with the wall around the Warsaw Ghetto. The cartoon showed one wall with the caption "Warsaw 1943" and another next to it with the words "West Bank 2003." Responding to complaints, Mark Scott, editor-in-chief of the Sydney Morning Herald and the Melbourne Age, said, "As editor in chief, I am aware that the cartoon caused significant offence to many readers, and I want to apologize to them."

Court Backs Cabinet Decision on Oberlander

OTTAWA — The federal cabinet's 2001 order to revoke the citizenship of accused war criminal Helmut Oberlander should not be subject to judicial review, because cabinet acted properly and reasonably, a Federal Court judge has ruled.

Cabinet's actions were "neither clearly wrong nor patently unreasonable," Justice Luc Martineau said earlier this month.

In 2000, a Federal Court found Oberlander served as an interpreter with a notorious Nazi death squad that executed thousands of civilians in Ukraine from 1941 to 1943, but did not disclose that information when he applied to come to Canada from Germany in the early 1950s. The 2000 ruling, along with a recommendation from the Ministry of Citizenship and Culture, led cabinet to seek his deportation.

Lawyers for the retired Waterloo, Ont., developer argued at a hearing in June that in making its order, the government ignored existing policy on suspected war criminals and didn't give enough reason for stripping Oberlander, 79, of his citizenship and seeking his deportation.

When Ottawa first began proceedings against him in 1995, his lawyers argued, government policy called for deportation only if there was "evidence of individual criminality" in war crimes, but despite being part of the death squad, there is no evidence Oberlander participated in atrocities.

Martineau ruled that by the time cabinet moved to revoke his citizenship, federal policy had been changed to include those "complicit" in war crimes, not just active participants.

Three major developments reshaping Mideast, Shimon Peres says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Three major developments are reshaping the political geography of the Middle East, Israeli elder statesman Shimon Peres told an audience here last week.

First, the United States has intervened in Iraq and is fighting the forces of global terrorism.

Second, the Palestinians have started the process of building a democratic society in the Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Third, the Likud party, in a historic break with its Revisionist Zionist ideology, has accepted the necessity of partitioning the Land of Israel and the inevitability of Palestinian statehood.

These developments, Peres claimed, may yet help resolve the region's problems and defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Peres, who turned 80 on Aug. 1, was in Toronto to raise funds for Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

The glittering event, hosted by Stacey and David Cynamon at their Forest Hill home, attracted about 200 donors.

In appreciation of his appearance, David Cynamon presented a smiling and relaxed Peres with a Toronto Maple Leafs jersey inscribed with his name and the number 80.

"For the man who has everything," Cynamon said jokingly.

Peres, the interim leader of the Labor party and Israel's former prime minister, defence minister, finance minister and father of its nuclear program, quipped that he has yet to win an Oscar.

In a more serious vein, Peres talked about the United States' invasion of Iraq this past March to remove Saddam Hussein and his Ba'athist regime from power.

"A year ago, we never dreamed the Americans would be our neighbour," he observed, saying the United States was in Iraq "to fight terrorism," the scourge of the new century.

Applauding the efforts by the Palestinians to build a functioning democracy, Peres described them as the only group in the Arab world close to attaining that goal.

The Palestinians, he pointed out, have an elected government and a new prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas. "They did it not for Israel and the United States, but for themselves," he said.

"The direction is right," he added.

But Peres warned that Abbas is weak and lacks the strength of the late Anwar Sadat, the slain Egyptian leader who made peace with Israel in the late 1970s.

Nevertheless, there is a chance that the Palestinian masses will support Abbas, he said.

In an implicit criticism of Israeli policy, Peres said Israel should take care not to humiliate the Palestinians.

Humiliation, he said, produces bitterness and terrorism.

Turning to the third development affecting the Middle East, Peres said that, politically, Israel was once divided between left and right.

But now that the Likud has concluded that partition and Palestinian statehood are in Israel's long-range interests, due to the "demographic problem," Israel is a much more united country, Peres noted.

In a brief survey of the Arab-Israeli dispute, Peres said, "Israel and the Palestinians are prisoners of the past. We committed mistakes and they did."

The Palestinians allowed radicals to hijack the Palestinian political agenda, while Israel erected "too many settlements" in the West Bank and Gaza.

To reach an accommodation with the Palestinians, Israel has no alternative but to "unmake" the "map of the past," he suggested, referring to the proliferation of Jewish communities in the territories.

Peres warned the Palestinians that unless they break up the various militias that currently challenge the legitimacy of the Palestinian Authority and build one army and one command structure, the current ceasefire (hudna) may fail.

Looking fit and dapper, Peres was in a mellow, playful mood at the outset of his talk.

Recalling a visit he paid to Iceland, he said the prime minister of that Nordic, snow-bound nation had observed, "You are the chosen people, we are the frozen people."

After a pause, Peres told his Toronto audience he would rather be a member of the chosen people.

Speaking of the plans by Shaare Zedek Medical Center to construct a 32,300-square-foot emergency medical facility, Peres said, "I can't think of a more important bridge to our [Arab] neighbours than medicine."

Comparing the Middle East to "a great hospital," Peres said the region is in dire need of "a team of doctors" to cure it of its ills.

Peace talks not on horizon for Israel and Syria: Rabinovich

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel and Syria will not resume peace talks any time soon, says Israel's former chief negotiator with Syria.

"There is no chance in the near future of talks with Syria," said Itamar Rabinovich, who held that position from 1992 to 1996 while serving as Israel's ambassador to the United States.

"Maybe in a few years down the road."

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is focused on the Palestinian track, said Rabinovich in an interview last week.

Sharon's predecessors – Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak – preferred a "Syria-first" negotiating policy.

By contrast, Sharon is concentrating on the Palestinians in the hope of signing an interim agreement with the Palestinian Authority (PA). "I think he genuinely wants to do that," said Rabinovich, who has been president of Tel Aviv University since 1999.

"The Syrians had four opportunities in the 1990s to reach an agreement with Israel and they squandered all of them. Now there is no opportunity."

Rabinovich was asked to state his views on the prospects of reviving the dormant Syrian peace process after both sides recently expressed a desire to start up bilateral talks again.

In May, Sharon declared, "I am ready to hold negotiations with any Arab nation, including Syria, without preconditions."

In an editorial in the state-owned newspaper Tishreen last month, Syria signalled an interest in such discussions. But it insisted negotiations must pick up where they broke off three years ago.

Israel dismissed Syria's willingness to renew talks as a ruse designed to ease intense U.S. diplomatic pressure on Syria to dismantle the offices and training camps of radical Palestinian factions in Damascus.

Syria's insistence that talks should begin at the point they stopped in January 2000 is not a legitimate demand, Rabinovich said. Nevertheless, he acknowledged, "You can never ignore the record of a negotiation."

Reviewing the history of Israel's on again, off-again talks with Syria since 1992, Rabinovich said the closest Israel and Syria ever came to homing in on a peace treaty was in August 1993.

Using then-U.S. secretary of state Warren Christopher as an intermediary, Rabin offered Syria a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for a comprehensive peace treaty.

Syria's president Hafez Assad accepted the offer in principle, but proceeded "to haggle over every detail," said Rabinovich, a historian who has written numerous books and monographs about Syria and Lebanon, including The Brink of Peace, an account of Israel's negotiations with Syria.

Assad, Rabinovich said, lacked the boldness of vision to take Rabin's gambit at face value, possibly because elements in the Syrian Ba'ath party and the security establishment were not too keen about signing a peace treaty with Israel.

Yet Rabin, with an Oslo peace deal in his pocket, was ambivalent as well, he said.

Criticizing the role played by the United States during this pivotal period, he said Christopher should have exerted more pressure on Syria to accept Rabin's so-called "deposit" without reservations.

"He didn't bang heads."

Israel's former chief negotiator says Ariel Sharon is focusing on dealing with Palestinians

In both rounds of negotiations, 1992 to 1996 and 1999 to 2000, Israel and Syria fell short of resolving the key issues, ranging from the contours of the security regime to the nature of the political relationship, he said.

Rabinovich thinks Barak would have agreed to withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines had these basic differences been settled and had Israelis, in a national referendum, voted for a complete withdrawal from the Golan.

He is not sure whether a majority of Israelis would have voted to return to the pre-Six Day War borders. But he is certain that Assad's disinclination to engage in "public diplomacy," such as his refusal to meet Israel's prime minister at a summit, was not constructive.

Lacking any firsthand knowledge of democracy, Assad did not understand that confidence building measures were important to advance the peace process.

"It was one of his most severe limitations," said Rabinovich.

In his estimation, an Israeli/Syrian peace accord would have benefited the entire region.

Apart from normalizing Israel's traditionally testy relations with Syria, a peace treaty would have strengthened moderate Palestinians, denied Iran influence and eliminated the possibility of another Arab-Israeli war.

Itamar Rabinovich

Rabinovich fears Syria's current president, Bashar Assad, who succeeded his father Hafez after his death in June 2000, is hotheaded when it comes to Hezbollah.

"He's playing with Hezbollah like a kid playing with fire," said Rabinovich, referring to the recent round of fighting along Israel's Lebanese border, during which a 16-year-old boy in the Galilee was killed by Hezbollah shelling.

Rabinovich said Syria and Iran, both of which feel threatened by the United States, have a great deal of influence over Hezbollah, "an arm" of the Iranian government.

Cognizant of its military inferiority to Israel, Syria wants to avoid a serious clash with Israel over Hezbollah, he said.

"But Syria chooses to control or not to control Hezbollah."

If Israel does not respond militarily to Hezbollah brinkmanship, Syria and Iran will "heat up" the border area, he predicted.

Israel was right to pull out of Lebanon unilaterally in 2000, Rabinovich noted. But the withdrawal had the "air of a defeated army withdrawing" and gave Hezbollah the impression it had scored a victory over Israel.

Turning to the road map peace plan, Rabinovich said it may yet succeed. U.S. President George W. Bush "wants it to work" and Israel and the PA wish to normalize the situation on the ground.

But a final status agreement is not in the offing. "What is feasible now is an interim accord. A permanent agreement can be negotiated if an interim accord works out." As for the hudna, the three-month ceasefire that expires Sept. 29, Rabinovich expects it to hold if the United States exerts sufficient pressure.

"The U.S. needs to go back to active, high-level involvement."

Why we say NO to Jews for Jesus

The Jews for Jesus missionary organization will be invading Toronto with an aggressive evangelistic crusade from August 25 until September 14. They will be targeting the entire Jewish community with a slick and deceptive mass-marketing campaign claiming that we can become more Jewish if we embrace Jesus and convert to Christianity! How do you spell "chutzpah"?! Some sober thoughts about Jews for Jesus:

Just as Israel is our homeland, Judaism is our religion. Jews for Jesus cynically seeks to drive a wedge between Jews and Judaism.

Their claim that we can become more Jewish by believing in Jesus is like saying you can become more of a vegetarian by eating steak. Jews for Jesus seeks to blur the distinctions between Judaism and Christianity.

That Jesus and his followers were Jews doesn't grant their movement automatic Jewish validity. After all, those who built the Golden Calf were also Jews. Christianity may have its roots in Judaism, but it quickly developed into a religion whose essential beliefs about the concept of the Messiah and the nature of G-d and how to relate to Him veered dramatically from Judaism. They finally canonized a different set of Holy Scriptures. The United States may have once been an English colony, but it would make little sense to tell British people today that they can become more British by becoming American citizens.

The claim by Jews for Jesus to be "completed Jews" is highly offensive. It implies that Jews who remain faithful to Judaism are somehow defective. Our Bible doesn't end by saying: "To be continued" or "Stay tuned for more". Christianity is not the completion of Judaism - it is a completely different faith.

While they claim to be Jews who have accepted Jesus, many of their missionaries are Gentiles, and have never been Jews.

We totally reject their tactics that include co-opting and twisting our sacred symbols and rituals and shamelessly exploiting the Holocaust, our most painful memory, in their pursuit of Jewish souls.

Many Christian leaders and denominations have condemned the unethical proselytizing of Jews for Jesus. The Long Island Council of Churches has accused them of "engaging in subterfuge and dishonesty" and of "mixing religious symbols in ways that distort their essential meaning."

Although Jews for Jesus have voluntarily separated themselves from our community, the door is always open for them to return. Thankfully, growing numbers are beginning to discover the profound spiritual treasures of Judaism.

If you have been confronted by groups like Jews for Jesus and require assistance, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is the Jewish community's resource. Please contact us to schedule a private consulatation,or if you'd like to receive a free educational tape and booklet.

Church passes landmark study on ties with Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The United Church of Canada, the country's largest Protestant denomination, has approved a landmark document – now church policy – calling for improved relations with Jews and stating that anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism are "affronts to the gospel of Jesus Christ."

Six years in the making, the study, titled Bearing Faith Witness, was approved unanimously at this month's 38th General Council meeting of the church in Wolfville, N.S. It's a far-reaching effort at conciliation with Jews, calling on the church's 2.8 million followers to re-examine their relations with Jews and to stop interpreting scriptures in ways that may lead to anti-Jewish stereotyping.

The report acknowledges a long history of Christian anti-Semitism, including within the United Church. It describes a history of interpreting Christian texts without appreciating their Jewish origins, resulting in "deeply-rooted anti-Jewish misinterpretation," and a track record of insensitivity with respect to the importance of the Holocaust to Jews.

"No other religion is as closely related to Christianity as Judaism," it states. "The Christian God is the God of Israel. Jesus and all the apostles were of Israel. Christian scripture includes the scriptures of Israel."

Former United Church moderator Rev. Robert Smith, chair of the Bearing Faithful Witness Committee, told commissioners the statement on relations with Jews was one of the significant issues to come before the General Council.

The document is an outgrowth of a petition the church's General Council passed in 1988 in response to the case of Holocaust-denying Alberta teacher James Keegstra. It called on the church to confront Christian anti-Semitism and mend fences with Jews.

The document now officially acknowledges that Jews and church members believe in the same God: "We believe that the God whom we know in Jesus Christ is the One who called Sarah and Abraham, gave the Torah to Moses, and put passion for justice into the hearts of the prophets."

It also stresses the Jewishness of Jesus, who "lives as a Jew, dies as a Jew and is raised as a Jew."

But it concedes that church members have not always acted in the spirit of Christian love: "Jesus commands us to love our neighbours, but all too often, Christians have treated Jews, our sisters and brothers, as enemies. We believe that our faith calls us to repent when the church has been unfaithful in its witness by not loving Jews as neighbours."

Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, one of the interfaith guests at the meeting, called the document a "milestone" in Jewish-Christian relations. "The United Church of Canada is making a lasting contribution to Jewish-Christian dialogue," he said.

The report could go some way in repairing decades of tense relations between Jews and the United Church, going back to the 1960s and the vituperatively anti-Israel articles in the church's newspaper, The United Church Observer.

Last summer, Canadian Jewish Congress withdrew from a dialogue with the United and Anglican churches after its leaders blamed Israel for Mideast violence. Those talks were restarted this spring.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's inter-religious affairs committee, told The CJN the new report is "an important document… a very significant step forward in relations. It doesn't try to excuse or hide anything."

While some church officials at the general council were said to be concerned that an expression of support for Israel's existence and security would diminish support for Palestinians and others in the Middle East, they were reminded that support for Israel is long-standing church policy.

The church approved a resolution that "strongly affirms the right of the state of Israel to exist in peace and in secure boundaries, and the right of Palestinians to a homeland state" – both within pre-1967 boundaries, subject to negotiation.

Touching on the long and acrimonious relations between the Jewish community and Jews for Jesus-type missionary groups, the study notes "a profound difference between proselytism and evangelism" and rejects "the direct and often manipulative targeting of Jews (and others) for conversion." It urges further study of evangelism "without seeking the conversion of the Jews or others."

From now on, the United Church rejects "all teaching of a theology of contempt toward Jews and Judaism [and] the belief that God has abolished the covenant with the Jewish people."

It affirms the significance of Judaism as both "a religion, a people, and a covenant community;" that both Judaism and Christianity "have developed from a common root;" and that "the love of God is expressed in the giving of both Torah and Gospel."

It encourages church members and congregations to meet with Jews and learn about modern Judaism; to be vigilant in resisting anti-Semitism; and to get involved in interfaith programming such as on Yom Hashoah.

CJC submits brief to CRTC on Al-Jazeera cable TV application

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Al-Jazeera, the Arab-language satellite news service, should not be carried on digital cable services in this country because it airs "hate propaganda" and would violate a host of Canadian laws and regulations, Canadian Jewish Congress has told the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC).

In a 37-page brief to CRTC secretary general Diane Rhéaume, Congress says the broadcast regulator should deny Al-Jazeera a place in Canadian television because the Qatar-based channel "has demonstrated a pattern of airing virulent and dangerous hate propaganda and/or contemptuous speech, largely targeted at the Jewish people."

Earlier this year, the Canadian Cable Television Association (CCTA) asked the CRTC, on behalf of several cable companies, including Montreal-based Videotron, to allow carriage of Al-Jazeera.

> 'Jews are frequently characterized as duplicitous, corrupt, world-dominating conspiratorial force'

Congress and B'nai Brith Canada immediately opposed the move, sparking a debate on free speech. The CRTC invited public comments on the matter last month.

The 24-hour news station is perhaps best known for broadcasting ominous statements against the West by Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

During the Iraq war, it was often dubbed the Arabic CNN and incurred the wrath of Arab countries for being too pro-Western and seeking Israeli perspectives.

Many Canadians already have access to Al-Jazeera via the "grey market" U.S.-based DirecTV satellite service.

CJC says in its Aug. 8 submission that on Al-Jazeera, "Jews are frequently characterized by hosts, guests and terrorists as a duplicitous, corrupt, world-dominating conspiratorial force; rights of Jews, individually and collectively, and their physical security are threatened; and Holocaust denial is commonplace. Suicide bombings are encouraged, while terrorist groups – including those outlawed by the Canadian government – are lauded."

Such programming would violate the Broadcasting Act, the Broadcasting Distribution Regulations, the Criminal Code and voluntary codes enforced by the Canadian Broadcast Standards Council, CJC argues. "Such hate speech is also inimical to the guarantee of free expression in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms," it adds.

CJC says it "strongly believes in freedom of expression as an essential element of democracy" but that freedom "is not absolute."

It says its opposition to the carriage of Al-Jazeera is based on its conviction that the dissemination of anti-Semitic hate speech "is contrary to Canadian values, Canadian law and Canadian public interest."

Among the many specific examples of Al-Jazeera's anti-Semitism provided by Congress are:

- A May 15, 2001 show that debated whether Zionism is worse than Nazism;
- a Jan. 22, 2002, segment in which a Saudi cleric called Jews "brothers of apes and pigs" and "the most despicable people... worms... all evil," and blamed Jews for the 9/11 attacks;
- a March 2003 sermon by bin Laden in which the Al Qaeda leader called Jews "murderers of the prophets... usurers and whoremongers," and other instances when he implored Muslims to "destroy the new Jewish crusade;"
- various instances of Holocaust denial;
- praising and championing suicide attacks against Israel;
- and interviews with U.S. figures Lyndon Larouche, known for his theories of Jewish conspiracies, and David Duke, a one-time leader of the Kû Klux Klan, in which both were permitted to discuss anti-Semitic canards.

If Al-Jazeera is green-lighted for carriage in Canada, the CRTC will have no ability to monitor, control or sanction any of its content, CJC warns. Should Al-Jazeera's content breach Canadian laws, the commission's only recourse would be to delist the service, Congress points out.

"This unsatisfactory solution, which has been rarely used by the CRTC in the past, is in our view tantamount to shutting the barn door after the proverbial horse has left the barn."

While Congress wants the applications by the CCTA and Videotron denied, it says an alternative would be to add Al-Jazeera to the digital lineup "under the strictest of conditions."

CRTC spokesperson Denis Carmel told The CJN he had no comment on CJC's submission. He said a decision on Al-Jazeera could be made before the end of the year.

Looking for peace in the classroom tacked on the corner of Prof. Sari Nusseibeh's boardroom table when a group of journalists visited last month were books dealing with critical thinking and argument-building, a skill apparently not taught in Palestinian high schools.

Palestinian students arrive at Al-Quds, the Arab university in east Jerusalem, trained in rote learning and never encouraged to question information, conclusions and points of view, Nusseibeh, the president of the university, explained when asked about the books. This becomes problematic when professors attempt to develop independent, objective thinkers who understand the merits of logical reasoning and fair analysis. The university is considering a curriculum to deal with this educational gap.

Interestingly, the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace (CMIP), a non-governmental organization established in 1998, recently presented its findings on the new textbooks that students in Palestinian elementary schools will use this coming year. The centre evaluated 35 books now being published by the Palestinian Authority for use in various subjects.

UNESCO and CMIP criteria were used as benchmarks in order to examine, among other things, whether ideals of freedom, dignity and fraternity are being advocated in the books, and to what extent education is fostering peace.

The good news is that Judaism is now presented as one of the three major monotheistic religions. The bad news is that almost every time Jews are mentioned, it is unfavourably. They are presented as a people who would shoot peaceful travellers on the road and are described as being analogous to hyenas. When tolerance is taught, it refers mainly to Christian-Muslim relations. Jews are not mentioned.

The CMIP found that peace is discussed in general terms. Ostensibly, the texts teach that "since the State of Palestine declares that it is a peace-loving state and is bound by the principles of peaceful co-existence, it will work with all states and peoples for the realization of a lasting peace… " The only problem is that Israel is never presented as a legitimate sovereign state. Not once. In fact, the maps of Palestine incorporate Israel into a Palestinian national homeland.

Apparently, the Palestinian Authority desires peaceful co-existence with all countries except for the one it is at war with.

As for terrorism, the books state that "the Palestinian Authority formally rejects terror." However, jihad and martyrdom are encouraged and exalted. The texts also present positive references to terrorist activities against Israeli civilians.

Palestinian children never learn that Israel is a country with boundaries and national aspirations like their own. The Jewish state is presented simply as an enemy that must be fought until the Palestinian homeland is restored.

A critical thinker might understand that peace can never be achieved in the region until Israelis are convinced that their legitimate rights to exist are acknowledged.

Perhaps Nusseibeh should hurry up with his curriculum.

Anti-Semitism growing

I have just read the article about the "right of return" conference and to say I am sickened is an understatement ("'Right of return' conference denounces Israel, PA," CJN, July 3). Who are these people to brand the State of Israel illegitimate?

In my day-to-day attempt to keep up with Middle East news, especially Israeli news, I have come across a lot of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic ranting that is very difficult to digest. But that conference and its obvious bias against Israel and its people are nothing but a hate campaign, which I was led to believe, was illegal in Canada.

It seems to me we are back in Nazi Germany. Anti-Semitism did not die with that malevolent regime. Instead, it has grown to a fearful degree.

Relentless review contains crucial error

Sheldon Kirshner's review of the film Relentless: The Struggle for Peace in Israel ("Film analyzes breakdown of Oslo peace process," CJN, July 3) fairly points out that the film's central thesis – the Palestinians breaking each of their major commitments in the Oslo peace process – is "true enough." But Kirshner then makes a significant factual mistake.

One of the most important agreements made in Oslo was for the PLO to change its charter that expresses its central purpose, the destruction of the State of Israel in its entirety, from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea (see the full text at http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/mideast/plocov.htm). Clearly, the peace architects reasoned, such a foundation document cannot remain as is, since it clearly opposes a two-state solution that "peace" was based upon.

Relentless points out that, like the Palestinian Authority's (PA) other obligations, such as stopping terror and ending anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist incitement, this obligation has also remained unfulfilled.

In stating that "the PA revised the covenant, not once but twice," Kirshner has succumbed to media obfuscation of the tallest order. In 1998, a full five years after the peace process was inaugurated, then-US. president Bill Clinton went to Gaza to try and force changes in the charter, and the media had a field day declaring the PA had fulfilled its promise. But the charter was not changed. All the parties agreed to on that "historic" occasion was to submit recommendations for changes in the future. No such recommendations were ever made, and the charter remains the same today.

As a journalist, Kirshner should know better. I am sure many people were similarly fooled. They are probably so convinced the charter was changed that they will assume I am the one mistaken. There is a very easy test to determine fact from fiction: read the new charter.

As a Canadian Jew who now lives in Israel, I truly desire to see peace come to the region, for the sake of both the Israelis and Palestinians. But our love for peace must not blind us. We are still negotiating with a PA whose charter calls for Israel's destruction.

No miscarriage of justice

In his article about the executions of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in the 1950s ("Rosenberg case still mired in controversy," CJN, June 26), Sheldon Kirshner quotes historians Ronald Radosh and Joyce Milton, who believe the executions were a grave miscarriage of justice.

In an article in the New York Post on June 13, Radosh noted that "Soviet intelligence… agents… provided the final proof that Julius was a Soviet agent" and gave the former Soviet Union "top-secret military data." Soviet documents, he said, revealed Ethel Rosenberg was an accessory to Julius' crimes. And he quoted a KGB agent, who said, "The Rosenberg network was one of the best producing groups of agents in the history of Soviet technological espionage."

The Rosenbergs were hard-core Communists during the Hitler-Stalin Pact. They scorned democracies, their family and their own lives in their fanatical commitment to the Stalinist empire.

Questions activist's logic

I was disturbed to read about the activities of gay rights activist Joanne Cohen and the Canadian Coalition of Liberal Rabbis for Same Sex Marriage ("Same-sex marriage ruling recognizes diversity: activist," CJN July 17). Cohen and the coalition have argued that same-sex marriage is good for Judaism. It boggles the mind.

Judaism has always understood marriage as a union sanctified by God. Since homosexual unions are explicitly banned by the Torah (Leviticus 18:22), how can they possibly be divinely sanctioned? The Jewish concept of marriage and the gay concept of marriage simply cannot co-exist.

Stealth evangelism and truth in packaging

By LEN RUDNER and RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

The Jewish community of Toronto will soon be subjected to a new attack by an old foe. From Aug. 25 to Sept. 14, missionaries from the Jews for Jesus organization will descend upon the city as part of their "Behold Your God" campaign. This five-year initiative, targeting cities worldwide with Jewish populations of 25,000 or more, will spend more than $22 million (US) to convince Jews to embrace Jesus. The deceptive thrust of this shameless crusade will be to promote the absurd idea that converting to Christianity is the most Jewish thing a Jew can do.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and Jews for Judaism have worked tirelessly against this kind of misleading proselytizing for more than two decades. While we understand the desire of Christians who seek to share their faith, we have always maintained that their outreach should be conducted in an open and honest fashion. By purposely blurring the distinctions between Judaism and Christianity and cynically co-opting sacred Jewish symbols and rituals, Jews for Jesus and similar groups fail the test of ethical evangelism.

When we became aware of this upcoming missionary campaign, our organizations worked together to develop a comprehensive, proactive response. Part of that strategy included sending a letter to more than 800 evangelical churches in Southern Ontario, urging them to take a public stand on this issue and commit themselves to the principles of respect and honesty in evangelism. It should be noted that mainline Protestant, Roman Catholic and Orthodox Christian denominations have long ago repudiated the offensive tactics of groups like Jews for Jesus.

The response from the evangelical community has been disappointing. Of the dozen or so replies that we have received, the overwhelming majority indicated that they support the work of Jews for Jesus and will continue to do so. A notable exception was Dr. Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College, in an important column he co-authored for the Toronto Star. McVety argued that one of the most serious challenges to the progress that has been made in interfaith relations is "the ongoing attempt by some Christian groups to lure Jews away from the faith of their ancestors in a manner that is both devious and deceptive." He specifically chided Jews for Jesus for manipulating language in a way that is misleading and unacceptable. As a corrective to these kinds of smokescreen semantics, McVety felt compelled to assert the obvious: "Judaism and Christianity are two different religions".

It's important to understand what drives Jews for Jesus' obsession with claiming that "it's Jewish to believe in Jesus." In truth, it is part of a shrewd marketing strategy that was developed at numerous missionary conferences decades ago that struggled with overcoming centuries of poor results evangelizing Jews. Their research revealed the existence of certain baseline axioms that are universally held even by the most assimilated Jews with virtually no religious education. In addition to the belief in one God, one of these truisms is that Jews do not believe that Jesus was the messiah. In choosing their organization's name and provocative tactics – both calculated to generate maximum exposure – Jews for Jesus has sought to square a theological circle. The group labours to legitimate what was once an impossible oxymoron, on par with "atheists for God" or "vegetarians for meat," using misleading rhetoric and mass marketing.

A frequent refrain in making their case, often repeated by their converts, is that "After all, Jesus was a Jew, and all his followers were Jews." Well, those who worshipped the Golden Calf may also have been Jews, but that didn't validate their activity. When the followers of Jesus eventually redefined the Jewish concept of "messiah" from a human king who will preside over a redeemed world to a divine saviour who dies to atone for sin, they created a new religion. The differentiation was concretized when they adopted a different set of scriptures from the Jews who continued to follow the path of Judaism.

> Jews for Jesus: an oxymoron on par with 'vegetarians for meat'

Nevertheless, Jews for Jesus realized that their approach could be effective in overcoming the guilt Jewish people normally felt when accepting foreign doctrines such as the Trinity. They have been successful to some degree in creating the impression that a Jew who has converted to Christianity is not a contradiction in terms.

Of course, they have accomplished this by carefully speaking out of both sides of their mouths. While playing up their "Jewishness" when seeking converts, they sing a different tune to their supporters. Years ago, they circulated a document titled "What evangelical Christians should know about Jews for Jesus," which was subtitled "A CONFIDENTIAL REPORT: not to be distributed to Non-Christians." In it, they state: "We define ourselves as evangelical fundamentalists... We feel that we are an arm of the local church."

In a letter sent to evangelical churches this past July, Andrew Barron, Canadian director of Jews for Jesus, expressed himself in terms never heard by the Jews he targets for conversion: "Why am I writing to you? Because I believe that as part of our family in Christ, you would want to use this opportunity to stand with us... Pray that Jewish hearts are softened to receive the gospel news as we are out in force on the streets over this special campaign time...We need the power of your pen. A letter from you to the [Canadian Jewish Congress] in which you inform them that we are your brothers and sisters in Christ... A letter that we can use to demonstrate to churches who do not have a relationship with us that we are 'kosher' and a part of the evangelical community." Barron and his organization refer to the people they evangelize as UJ's (unsaved Jews). It doesn't require much imagination to understand why this unflattering designation is only used "in-house."

A subsequent letter sent by Barron to Toronto-area rabbis can only be characterized by invoking Shakespeare: "The missionary doth protest too much!" While assuming the posture of a persecuted minority, Barron reassures the rabbis that his organization "has great respect and appreciation for the Jewish tradition." This position is difficult to reconcile with some of the startlingly candid statements from Rev. Martin Rosen, the founder of Jews for Jesus: "We have waited too long to teach that Judaism is a false religion." "Orthodox Judaism is darkness and superstition." "To be Jewish, to be really Jewish, is to feel guilty". When instructing his staff to publicly push the "party line" that "Judaism is a false religion," he advises, "After making such a statement, keep ameliorating it by saying how much you love the Jewish people."

The exploiting of Jewish ritual for evangelistic purposes is a further example of Jews for Jesus' duplicity. Its members maintain that Judaism is a false religion because it is based upon what they believe to be the illegitimate teachings of the Talmudic rabbis who added to the Bible. However, while demeaning the authority of our sages, the Jewish practices they employ mimic rabbinic traditions not found in the Bible. Examples include the wearing of skullcaps and the lighting of Chanukah candles.

One of most "un-Jewish" aspects of Jews for Jesus is their insistence that the only way to have a relationship with God is through Jesus. This position was made crystal clear on a Larry King Live program in January 2000 that featured David Brickner, the executive director of Jews for Jesus; Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder and dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center; Rabbi Schmuley Boteach, founder of the Oxford L'Chaim Society; and R. Albert Mohler Jr., head of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Brickner maintained, in the face of repeated questioning from King, that the two rabbis face an eternity in hell because they don't accept Jesus as their saviour. This "My way or the highway!" theology is clearly not a Jewish one – the Hebrew scriptures never teach that non-Jews must practise Judaism in order to serve God. Our sages clearly teach that "the righteous of all nations have a share in the world to come."

We must stress that our purpose here is not to judge the merits of one religion over another. It is simply and respectfully to note that the theological positions of Judaism and Christianity are not congruent, and that attempts to cloud this issue are dishonest.

The tactics of groups like Jews for Jesus amount to nothing less than "stealth evangelism" and constitute a form of identity theft. Their upcoming crusade is a frontal assault on our community, which prompted our letter of June 18 to the evangelical churches. We hope that a full consideration of the issue may still lead some in that community to reconsider their support of Jews for Jesus. Ultimately, the success or failure of their efforts will depend on what kind of Jewish homes, synagogues and communities we foster. Knowledgeable Jews who appreciate the beauty and depth of Judaism and integrate its spirituality into their lives joyously and passionately will be immune to predatory missionaries.

We invite all Toronto Jews to participate in a city-wide "Stand Up For Judaism Shabbat" on Saturday, Sept. 6, and to attend a special "Stand Up For Judaism Rally" on Sunday, Sept. 7 at 8 p.m. at the Toronto Zionist Centre, 788 Marlee Avenue.

Rabbi Michael Skobac is director of education for Jews for Judaism. Len Rudner is director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Judging Harry Truman

I am sure my readers know that Harry S. Truman was a president of the United States, but you may not be aware that, back in the 1940s, he wrote very critical things about Jews in his personal diary.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"The Jews, I find, are very, very selfish," he wrote in July 1947, 10 months before the British mandate in Palestine expired and David Ben-Gurion declared Israel's independence.

"They care not how many Estonians, Latvians, Finns, Poles, Yugoslavs or Greeks get murdered or mistreated as [displaced persons] as long as the Jews get special treatment."

He continued: "Yet when they have power, physical, financial or political neither Hitler nor Stalin has anything on them for cruelty or mistreatment to the underdog.

"Put an underdog on top and it makes no difference whether his name is Russian, Jewish, Negro, Management, Labor, Mormon, Baptist he goes haywire. I've found very, very few who remember their past condition when prosperity comes."

Despite these comments, which came to light only recently, Truman was the first international leader to recognize the State of Israel in 1948, thereby giving it a boost it sorely needed.

How can we reconcile this apparent contradiction?

Well, we cannot, and we also are not required to do so. Most people – whether ordinary or famous – are likely to utter things once in a while that, on second thought, they wish they had not said.

Especially when considering famous people such as Truman, it is best to judge them by their deeds and not merely by their words.

Many historians do not consider Truman to be one of the great American leaders. But his early recognition of the Jewish state represents an enormously important historical landmark, for the American president thereby publicly acknowledged Israel as a legitimate part of the international community. By doing so, Truman acquired a permanent place of importance in the history of our people.

In addition to that achievement, he deserves to be remembered for another important act during his presidency. In 1951, he fired the highly popular Gen. Douglas MacArthur, then the commanding officer of the United Nations forces, who was unwilling to conduct a limited war in Korea.

Without that action, there would have been a real possibility, if not likelihood, that MacArthur would sooner or later have become president himself.

If you would like to know more about Truman, read David McCullough's 1992 biography, or read Samuel Eliot Morrision's account of his administration (which lasted from 1945 to 1953) in Morrision's Oxford History of the American People.

Truman was, basically, a simple man who had a keen understanding of what America needed from him, as well as the guts to act on it. This combination assures him a place in history.

Racial intolerance is out there

I found myself trapped indoors the other day in a futile attempt to escape a recent heat wave, fanning myself with a magazine that I soon discovered was actually much better put to use as reading material.

In this recently published journal on the best Canadian magazine writing of our times, one article in particular caught my eye.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Though it was published in 1985, it is still relevant today, especially if you live in Alberta.

The article, called "Keegstra's Children," was an extremely well-written, often chilling account of a class of students who grew up being taught by Holocaust denier and well-known anti-Semite Jim Keegstra.

For 10 years, Keegstra taught anti-Jewish conspiracy theory to high school students in the remote rural farming town of Eckville, Alta., located halfway between Calgary and Edmonton.

The theories he fed the students were really quite incredible – stories not backed up by any credible source of information, but lapped up eagerly by his students and regurgitated back on tests and assignments.

"Moles only come out in the dark when no one is watching," wrote one of his students on exam day, who was awarded full marks for her answer. "Jews only do their deeds when no one is watching. A mole, when mad, will strike back and have no mercy if disturbed. Jews strike at any time and have no mercy. No one knows the Jews are there until they strike."

It's absolutely flabbergasting that just a few years ago, just a few miles away from where I live, people in this modern day and age soaked this up so unquestioningly.

But Alberta is, after all, the country's most conservative province, and with its stirrings of homophobia and xenophobia comes a healthy dose of racial intolerance.

I know it's out there.

I walk into work every day surrounded by middle-aged white men, many of whom grew up in small towns before they struck gold in the oil fields and moved into the corporate sector.

Some of these men have gone on to share their business acumen as university professors.

A friend of mine looking for advice in the job interview process recently consulted a professor we both know for some career tips.

"Well, you've got two things going for you," he said to her.

"First, you're a woman, and second, you're of color. So, you definitely have a chance."

The same professor had earlier critiqued my own resumé. When he saw that I wrote for The CJN, he said I might want to consider leaving it off to keep my "options open."

But I'm not sure what those options might be if I have to lie about something as integral as my own identity.

While in the past, some Jews survived because they had less "ethnic" physical features and were able to pass themselves off as Christians, it makes me wonder why we still live in a world where concealing ethnicity is deemed necessary for success.

Sometimes, I hear things that are distant cousins of Keegstra's blatant anti-Semitism, but that still come from the same family tree.

"Oh, you're dating a Jewish guy? Great. They have a lot of money, you know," one of my friends informed me once.

I guess if that's the truth, my inheritance must still be in the mail.

Other gems include:

"You're Jewish? I love Jewish people! I watched Fiddler on the Roof three times."

"Damn Jews, they're taking over the science faculty at school, they're absolutely everywhere."

"You're Jewish? Tell me, is it true that Jews are buried sitting straight up in their graves?"

Undoubtedly, the only way to combat this kind of ignorance is to stay true to who we are.

The greatest pearl of wisdom I read in the Keegstra article ironically came from one of his own students:

"Mr. Keegstra used to say history, on its own, is of no value at all," the student said. "But if you don't know what went on, you're bound to repeat it."

Looking forward to September

I must admit that I am anxiously awaiting my return to Halifax and university life. As long as summer vacation involves employment, school remains a better deal.

Call me a princess, but there is more to this feeling than simple laziness. Of course, my 15-hour-a-week class schedule is more appealing than my 40-hour workweek. During the school year, I can sleep to a reasonable hour (the work world's 7 a.m. is unreasonably early for a student), and my daily schedule is flexible. There is time for working out, for random meetings, and for all the other extra-curricular activities that fill the day.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

It's not necessarily that I feel less stressed at school – there is always something hanging over my head and, if you are concerned with academic success, scholastic pressure is constant. But after my stint in the work world, the stress of school is not something I dread as much as I once did.

Those of us who were lucky enough to go to camp cherish our days there. As a counsellor, you work around the clock and barely sleep, but if you're playing with kids all day, you remain a kid yourself. Alas, you eventually learn that you need to earn more money than the few pennies you find in your pocket at the end of the summer.

University often brings you to this realization. As you edge closer to the real world, you find that you need a real job.

So you look for one that will be stimulating, one that is along your future career path and makes use of your expensive education, as well as one that will pay enough to make a dent in the coming year's expenses – that is, a job that requires a little more than serving french fries or folding T-shirts.

But reality quickly sets in. You have little experience, no degree, and too few skills to be of real use to anyone. Your good grades don't translate into a job, and, ultimately, no one wants to hire you. That is, until you play a valuable little card: your connections.

It hurts to admit it, but you can't knock it. With only a few years of an arts degree under your belt (science students have it a bit easier in this regard), it never hurts to know people, and to know people who know people who just might hire you.

The bit of fame I have garnered from writing this column (combined with my "connections") helped land me my current summer job. Known as "the writer," I am working in a law firm writing up case studies. I feel lucky to gain experience in a field I wish to pursue.

After an initial foray into the world of filing and collating, I got the opportunity to apply my writing and analytical skills. Now, I must actually wake up my brain on the subway ride downtown.

So, I admit that my entrance into the work world hasn't been all that bad. Compared to stories I have heard, including tales of weeks spent in the depths of a mailroom, I have definitely come out ahead. I am doing something of relevance and gaining valuable experience.

When push comes to shove, though, I can't wait to get back to school. I crave a good lecture on the philosophical intricacies of Hegel. There's something about learning arguably useless subject matter. While it's not quite about knowledge for its own sake, university life remains personal and exploratory. It's about how you get there almost as much as it is about what you end up with. An admitted geek, I get more out of putting an essay together than I do in receiving a grade for it.

I will have enough years in the real world and more than enough years of employment. So when September rolls around, I will bask in the pressures of academia and appreciate a schedule that, no matter how intense, seem easier to handle than this summer's daily grind. I will enjoy the seemingly frivolous learning that I find so much fun.

For now, though, it's nine to five and a paycheque. Can't forget the thrill of that paycheque.

The Kirshner File

Oligarchs control Russia's new economy

Modern Russian capitalism was born on the ashes of Soviet communism, which suppressed normal human impulses taken for granted in civilized countries such as Canada and the United States: individual initiative and entrepreneurship.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Boris Yeltsin, the first president of post-Soviet Russia, sought to build a society modelled on Western values and norms. But in his eagerness to break with the stultified and discredited past, he and his liberal reformist advisors chose to concentrate on freedom first and rules later. The new Russian-style economy they devised was thus a wild creature unfettered by effective laws and controls. It could be compared to the unruly, rapacious robber-baron capitalism of late 19th century America.

The players in this system were smart, ambitious, ruthless and secretive individuals who had been raised in cramped apartments and who had never reconciled themselves to constant consumer shortages and bread lines.

Even before the collapse of communism, they had learned to manipulate weaknesses – seizing on imbalances in prices, property and trade, buying up state assets and creating new enterprises. Almost overnight, they acquired vast personal fortunes and political influence, mixing wealth with power.

They were known as the oligarchs.

David Hoffman, the foreign editor and former Moscow correspondent of The Washington Post, has written an intriguing account of their rise and, in some cases, their fall. The book, The Oligarchs (Public Affairs), meticulously traces the careers of six of these wily tycoons: Boris Berezovsky, Vladimir Gusinsky, Mikhail Khodorkovsky, Alexander Smolensky, Anatoly Chubais and Yuri Luzhkov.

Boris Berezovsky

All but the last two are of Jewish origin. Being a thorough reporter, Hoffman not only immersed himself in the literature of that period, but interviewed all six entrepreneurs at length. Reading their profiles, a reader gets a sense of the seismic transformation that has reshaped Russia in the past decade or so.

Berezovsky, the only son of a construction engineer and a pediatric nurse, was born in Moscow in 1946. After studying at a forestry school, the Institute of Control Sciences hired him as a researcher in applied mathematics. He was a hard worker, but realized that his path to upward mobility was blocked by anti-Semitism.

Berezovsky's ascent began with a simple desire to own a car. He bought old cars in Germany and sold them in Russia at fantastic profits. He also convinced the Fiat/Zhiguli automobile factory in Russia to sell him fleets of cars on consignment. By 1994, Logovaz, Berezovsky's company, was not just Russia's largest Zhiguli dealer, but a purveyor of German, Japanese, American and Swedish vehicles.

Targeted by criminal gangs, he fled to Israel and obtained Israeli citizenship. He returned to Moscow, only to fend off an assassination attempt and attacks against his showrooms.

Through connections in the Kremlin, he bought the privatized Channel 1, Russian Public Television. Thanks in part to its fawning coverage of the 1996 general election, Yeltsin was elected president. In gratitude, Yeltsin appointed Berezovsky deputy secretary of the Kremlin's Security Council, a position he forfeited by virtue of his Israeli citizenship. Berezovsky fared much better as a businessman. His tentacles reached into a huge oil company and Aeroflot, the Russian state airline, and his expanding interests included ownership of a Moscow newspaper and a glossy magazine.

Vladimir Gusinsky

Although Berezovsky was instrumental in helping Yeltsin's hand-picked successor, Vladimir Putin, win the 2000 presidential election, the two bickered over Chechnya and Putin's proposal for stronger central control over Russia's independent-minded regional governors. By way of retribution, Putin forced him to divest himself of some of his properties. Seeing the handwriting on the wall, Berezovsky, who had in the meantime converted to Christianity, fled to Britain. Last November, Moscow asked for his extradition, having accused Berezovsky of embezzlement and financing Chechen guerrillas.

Gusinsky, Berezovsky's associate, was born in 1952, into a family whose members had been victims of Stalinist purges. Gusinsky trained as a stage director, hoping to ply his trade in a Soviet theatre. But doors were slammed shut in his face because of his Jewishness. Instead, he staged public concerts and cultural events and drove an unofficial taxi to and from Moscow airport.

Alexander Smolensky

By chance, Gusinsky started selling copper bracelets through a co-operative. The venture was a great success. Caught trading hard currency, he made the best of a bad situation by befriending KGB officers. Hoffman writes that Gusinsky had a knack for cultivating security men and politicians. In 1988, he opened a consulting business to assist Western investors in Russia. Then he turned to building renovation. But he saved his best efforts for Media-Most, a communications empire consisting of a TV station and periodicals in Russia and a daily, Ma'ariv, in Israel.

Like Berezovsky, Gusinsky incurred the wrath of Putin, who was none too pleased by the criticism Gusinsky's television channel levelled against him. Gusinsky's corporate headquarters were raided and he was charged with fraud. Under relentless pressure, Gusinsky – the founder and first president of the Russian Jewish Congress and a patron of Russia's Jewish community – was compelled to sell his holdings and forced into exile. Today, he divides his time between Spain, Israel and the United States.

Mikhail Khodorkovsky

Khodorkovsky, a graduate of a chemical technology institute in Moscow, made his fortune by cleverly exploiting the imbalance between Soviet banknotes and the virtual currency used by state factories. Having beaten the system, he moved into banking.

After snapping up a plethora of companies, he established Rosprom, a financial and industrial conglomerate trading in oil, metallurgy, chemicals, food, textiles, wood pulp and paper.

Still not satisfied, Khodorkovsky, now 40, seized control of Yukos, Russia's second largest oil company, with 100,000 workers and a market capitalization of $9 billion (U.S.)

In 1998, he announced plans to merge Yukos with Sibneft, a smaller oil company Berezovsky had founded. But it was not until this past April that the merger actually took place.

The merged firm, Yukos-Sibneft, is Russia's biggest vertically integrated oil company, accounting for 22 per cent of the country's production, and the world's fifth largest publicly traded oil company. Before the merger, Khodorkovsky said he hoped that his company would be among the world's 10 top oil companies within a decade.

According to Forbes magazine, he is the richest man in Russia today. Having followed Berezovsky's and Gusinsky's careers, he has been careful not to cross Putin. But of late, he has antagonized the Russian president, having funnelled funds to opposition political parties.

Smolensky, born in 1954, was brought up in poverty, his father having deserted his mother. After the army, he was a shop steward in a publishing house, secretly printing Bibles in defiance of the law.

He moonlighted as a baker and started a building materials co-operative before opening Bank Stolichny, the core of of his industrial empire today.

Certain Russian nationalists have tried to whip up anti-Semitism by calling into question the role of "Zionist capital" in Russia's march toward a free market economy.

Their crude attempts to incite racial hatred have largely fallen on deaf ears, even though the oligarchs, having aroused jealousy and resentment, are far from popular among the Russian masses.

Jewish Life

Through the eyes of the Eagle

Roots & Remembrance

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

When Russian-Polish immigrant Hirsch Wolofsky decided to launch a Yiddish daily newspaper in Montreal in August 1907, it was clearly an idea whose time had come.

Impoverished Russian-Jewish masses fleeing pogroms, revolution and war had started settling in Montreal in record numbers. Strangers in a strange land, they read New York Yiddish papers like the Forwerts, but they had no effective way of knowing about their local civic and cultural surroundings.

"New immigrants who could not read the English newspapers were ignorant of what was happening in their city," observed journalist Israel Medres, a distinguished contributor to the new daily.

"For them Montreal was a closed book. The Keneder Adler opened that book for them. It revealed to them that they lived in a large metropolis with people of diverse languages, races, beliefs, and cultures."

A distinctly Canadian, Jewish intellectual voice in the wilderness, Montreal's Keneder Adler was one of several early Yiddish newspapers that helped immigrants adapt to life in Canada. The "Canadian Eagle," as its name translates, also fulfilled another vital function by sparking the formation of Jewish fraternal organizations, sick benefit societies, libraries, a national congress and other communal structures.

Two recent books from Montreal's Vehicule Press shed welcome light on the almost-forgotten pages of this once-influential journal. Through the Eyes of The Eagle: The Early Montreal Yiddish Press, 1907-1916 offers English translations of a range of pieces by distinguished journalists and editors, including Wolofsky, Medres, Reuben Brainin, Isaac Yampolsky, A. M. Mandelbaum and Shalom Aleichem.

In articles such as "A Day in the Editor's Office," Yampolsky charmingly conveys some of the harried comic flavour of working under constant deadline pressure while being repeatedly interrupted by members of the public and other nuisances.

A woman enters with a child: "I am asking you to put him in the papers and bury him deep – my husband, I mean. He deserted me two years ago because I was yelling at him, he said. Do I yell? It is only my habit. I speak loudly." She doesn't leave until the editor promises to run a photo of her errant spouse in the paper's Gallery of Missing Husbands.

A rabbi enters: "I will speak in a synagogue on Sabbath, so I'd like you to write something about me."

Finally, no more interruptions. Yampolsky watches his editor write feverishly: "The pen bends under the speed and races like a fire. If anybody will interrupt him, I will throw him down the steps head first."

Yampolsky picks up a pen and follows suit; the typesetters hover, awaiting fresh manuscript pages. "We both write. Writing is like a milk cow. As long as the milk comes, we milk. When the milk stops coming, we milk it anyway."

Besides light humour, the volume offers historical material on Montreal's Jewish institutions, articles about theatre and politics, and even some fiction. The book was a pet project of the late historian David Rome, who made the selections and did the translations, and was knowledgeably edited by Yiddish scholar Pierre Anctil.

An equally absorbing Vehicule title is Montreal of Yesterday: Jewish Life in Montreal, 1900-1920, by Israel Medres, translated from the Yiddish by Vivian Felsen. Already favourably reviewed in these pages, the book features many articles that originally appeared in the Keneder Adler.

The genealogist asks: did the Keneder Adler publish death notices? The answer is yes. The Jewish Genealogical Society of Ottawa offers a searchable database on its Web site, www.jgso.org.

The historian asks: did David Rome leave behind any more uncompleted projects? The answer is yes. This month, Montreal genealogist Anne Joseph and archivist Janice Rosen published limited copies of an unfinished treatise of Rome's under the title, House of Life: A History of Jewish Cemeteries in Canada. The work should be available shortly in select libraries and archives.

Thoughts on death and sorrow

Books
Bernard Baskin

In his classic work, The Denial of Death, Ernest Becker maintained that North Americans had so busied and buried themselves in the everyday world that they tended to deny the basic facts of life, death in particular. Becker, who succumbed to cancer, worked on his book through his final days, almost as if living out his own thesis.

I suspect that we all focus on the hurly-burly of the everyday world and never look to our own mortal limits. We plan our projects, stretching them indefinitely into the future. We believe, every day, that "tomorrow will be another day." We act and feel as if we have all the time in the world. Of death we simply say, "It will come when it comes." We tend to put off what is truly important until we "clear the path," "put out a few fires," and take care of urgencies. But the path is never clear, and the fires keep burning, and someday there is no tomorrow.

The world spins, but we do not feel it. Time moves, and we do not realize it. No matter how meticulously we mark off the instants into days, months and years, we are still surprised when we look back at the distance that has accumulated behind us. Suddenly we are appalled that so much time has passed because we are aware of our certain destination.

There is an old parable of a king who once owned a large, beautiful, pure diamond of which he was justly proud, for it had no equal anywhere. One day, through a mishap, the diamond sustained a deep scratch. The king called in the most skilled diamond cutters and offered to reimburse them handsomely if they could remove the imperfection from his treasured jewel, but none could repair the blemish. After some time, a gifted lapidary came to the king and promised to make the rare diamond even more beautiful than it had been before the accident. The king was impressed by his confidence and entrusted the precious stone to his care. The man kept his word. With superb artistry, he used the scratch to form the stem.

Despite its forbidding countenance, sorrow possesses great potential power to expand our lives, enlarge our vision and deepen our understanding. Through the portals of sorrow, we can enter into the suffering of others. Our human compassion is kindled. Our sympathies are broadened. Grief can also help purge us of pettiness and selfishness and elicit from us powers of fortitude and patience which, but for it, would never have occured. Sorrow can thus bring us closer to our fellow humans and help introduce us to ourselves.

Thus it is quite possible to emulate those of whom the Psalmist wrote, "They pass through a valley of tears and convert it into a life-giving fountain." Our sorrows can serve as "needles with which god sews our souls to eternal truths." If we face sorrow affirmatively and creatively, we can use it to enhance life's meaning and benefit others as well as ourselves.

This truth seems to be symbolized by a strange tree that grows near Bombay. Called "The Sorrowful Tree," it has the remarkable characteristic of blooming only at night. As soon as the sun sets, the flowers begin to bloom. May not this also be our uniquely human endowment? Like that tree, we can also bring forth flowers of surpassing beauty in the dark night of sorrow.

More Hebrew on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at Web sites that help teach Hebrew. Today, I conclude my look at Hebrew and the Web with an easy way to surf in Hebrew – along with some other choice Hebrew sites. And with only a few weeks until the end of the Jewish year, I note the two best Jewish calendar sites on the Web.

Reading Hebrew Web pages can be extremely pleasurable but incredibly frustrating. There definitely are ways to teach browsers like Internet Explorer how to display Hebrew. And although Explorer has made strides over the years with some built-in Hebrew support, I strongly suggest a different browser. Download Mozilla. What is remarkable about Mozilla is how well it displays pages in Hebrew with no extra tweaking from you. [http://mozilla.org] Note that some Hebrew Web pages can be quite cranky and that Mozilla is not perfect. But it is definitely worth the (free) download.

Once you have Mozilla downloaded, where should you go? There are thousands of Hebrew Web sites, but I suggest starting with two popular Hebrew directories, Walla [http://www.walla.co.il/] or Tapuz. [http://www.tapuz.co.il/] Or, check out the latest news in Ha'aretz newspaper. [http://www.haaretz.co.il] Or read some online Torah (along with the rest of the Tanach and the complete Mishnah, Gemarah and the Rambam's Mishneh Torah.) [http://www.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/kodesh.html]

After some Hebrew surfing, are you finding your grammar and vocabulary a bit rusty? There are many great software applications you can purchase to help learn Hebrew. [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=156] If you want to try a free program, check out Foundation Stone created by Ben Stitz of Sydney, Australia. Download it and test your knowledge of some common and not-so-common Hebrew words. The program's sophistication shows as it remembers your mistakes and forces you to review those words more often. [http://foundationstone.com.au/] Bravo Ben.

Aside from their simple meaning, Hebrew words are also thought to contain mystical significance. For example, why do Jews feel a special affinity to the number 18? Through the study of "gematria," we are taught that 18 is equivalent to the Hebrew word "chai" – life. Gematria is the ancient Jewish form of numerology that assigns each letter of the Hebrew alphabet a numerical value. Jews look to the values of words and phrases to reveal hidden truths about Torah and Kabbalah. We know that lucky chai is 18 because the letter "chet" is equivalent to 8 and the "yud" is 10. While adding to 18 isn't too taxing, some gematria calculations can get quite elaborate. That's where Yale University's online Gematria Calculator comes in handy. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?11F462095] Just key in a series of letters and their values are displayed immediately. As for discovering the secrets hidden in the numbers, that's your challenge.

Rosh Hashanah is a month away and that likely means it's time to buy a new Jewish calendar. Although online Jewish calendars aren't as pretty as the ones you'll get from your bakery, there are some great Jewish calendars on the Web. The two best are Kaluach and Havienu L'Shalom's Month-at-a-Time Hebrew Calendar. Aside from converting dates between the Jewish and secular calendars, Havienu's also provides the weekly parshah and let's you decide whether to display words in "Ashkenazis" or "Sephardit." As well, when you choose from dozens of pre-set cities, it gives you Shabbat candlelighting times. And if you're spending time off the Jewish path, just plug in your longitude and latitude to get candlelighting times. [http://www.torah-bits.org/havienu/calendar/hebcalmonthview.html]

Kaluach does all that, but it also supplies you with the earliest and latest times you can recite certain prayers or put on tfillin. It also allows you to save your personal events on its server. Kaluach.net will display birthdays, anniversaries, and yahrzeits, and send you e-mail reminders. Unlike Havienu, Kaluach isn't free. Creator Yisrael Hersch has obviously put a lot of effort into his site and requests a "small payment" for its continued operation. [http://www.kaluach.net]

By the way, it seems Hersch has a sense of humour. While it's not unusual for software developers to include disclaimers or legal notes on their sites, I've never seen one quite like Hersch's: "Rabbi safe! No rabbis were harmed during the development of Kaluach."

Of Bay St. and Rabbi Mordechai Bengio St.

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Once, a long. long time ago, when Toronto was just a collection of clapboard shacks on the muddy shores of Lake Ontario, legend has it that a bear ran through one of its streets. That's how the street acquired the name Bear Street: in honour of the brown bear that rumbled through it.

With time and a bit of "Canajian" pronunciation, Bear Street became today's Bay Street.

A city's street names do more than identify addresses. They lay bare its folklore and express the history and heritage particular to that city.

History and heritage are things whose preservation, I believe, is very worthwhile. Evidently, the municipal authorities in my birthplace (and the birthplace of a sizeable number of other Canadian Jews) believe otherwise.

Tangiers, in what is now Morocco, on the tip of North Africa, was once a truly cosmopolitan and international city. It was governed by France, while at the same time greatly influenced by Spain. Once, many and varied European nationals called Tangiers home. The Jewish presence in Tangiers was also quite prominent.

The names of Tangiers' streets and boulevards once reflected this kaleidoscope. Up until recently, one could look up at the names on its street signs and quickly recognize the many influences and flavours that once made up this city.

This is, unfortunately, no longer the case. All street names that refer to Tangiers' international past have been replaced with solid Arabic names. But Tangiers did not just lose the names of streets. Its real loss was in losing its Europeans and its Jews.

Straddling the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, Tangiers was truly an international zone of commerce. On the African continent, but more a part of Europe, it was also a unique location where three faiths met in tolerance: Friday being sacred to Muslims, Saturdays to Jews, and Sundays to Christians.

Today, that busy sea port oozing with charm and character is no more. Long gone are the Europeans and the Jews. What remains is a small and dirty point on the map that is of little significance.

How sad.

As for myself, Tangiers' glorious past lives on in my mind. Irrespective of what the Arabs today might call the street of my childhood home, for me, it will always remain La Calle Goya. Likewise, my grandmother's house, where each week I romped with all my cousins on Shabbat afternoons, will always in my mind be located on La Place de France.

But most importantly, for me, the street in the Marchan neighbourhood that honoured the memory of my great-great-grandfather, the venerable leader of the "Tangerinos" Rabbi Mordechai Bengio, will, likewise, always retain his name.

For his memory lives on, as do the vivid memories of all those who lived in Tangiers during those wonderful years.

And no one can change that, for as much as people will try to erase, rewrite and revise it, history will prevail.

New Friends group aims to help Israel's firefighters

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Ottawa firefighter Lorne Shusterman was pouring himself a cup of coffee and watching TV in his kitchen on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, when a photo of the first burning World Trade Center building flashed on the screen.

An electrical fire, he thought. That building's going to come down.

Then he saw a plane circle low and smash into the second tower, and realized something far worse was happening.

More than 240 firefighters died on Sept. 11, but they saved thousands of people, going floor to floor until the fire pushed them back, said Shusterman.

"There were firefighters going in there asking for last rites because they knew they weren't coming out of there.

"I went to work because I didn't know what to do with myself, even though it was my day off," he said. "They wanted everyone manning the rigs in Ottawa, because maybe they'd hit the Parliament buildings."

As the only Jewish firefighter in Ottawa's history, Shusterman knew he couldn't stay at home and do nothing. He signed up to go on a mission to Israel, where he visited a fire station and told them that they are not alone.

Speaking at a fundraiser last week for the Friends of Israeli Firefighters, Shusterman said firefighters in Israel, who are always first at an emergency scene, desperately need new equipment.

"Their equipment should be the best, or at least adequate. They don't even have adequate."

Fundraiser Eldad Halachmi said Israeli firefighters need oxygen cylinders and suits to protect them against hazardous chemicals. As well, he said, fire stations need renovations and those on the Green Line need security upgrades, and some of the fire trucks still in use are from the 1967 war and desperately need to be replaced.

Halachmi fears Israel's fire services won't have enough manpower or equipment to respond if forest fires break out and destroy the trees planted by the Jewish National Fund, as they did in 1996.

"They don't have enough gear for everyone. When they're on shifts, then it's okay, but if they are all needed, then it's not enough equipment.

"In terms of an emergency, this is one of the top things a society in war needs," said Halachmi.

The Israeli Fire and Rescue Services, the firefighters' umbrella organization, received some money from the Jewish Agency's emergency campaign last year, but according to Halachmi, "it's not even scratching the real needs."

This year, United Israel Appeal has made the Israeli Fire and Rescue Services its top priority, and since the Friends of Israeli Firefighters was formed last year, it has collected $1.5 million from Jewish communities worldwide, including $220,000 from UJA Federation in Toronto.

The money has paid for renovations at the Kfar Saba and Ramla fire stations and bought one fire truck each for Be'er Sheva and Eilat. Evangelical Christians from Washington, D.C., also donated a fire boat for the Kinneret.

But Israel still needs 90 new fire trucks, and the price tag per truck ranges from $300,000 to $1 million (US).

"The house is burning, literally, and something needs to be done about it," said Halachmi.

Meanwhile, Shusterman said his colleagues watch TV at work and are amazed by what the Israeli firefighters are doing.

"Even the non-Jewish guys, I sit with them at work and they ask, 'How do these guys do it?'" he says.

"They're still getting 9/11 every day."

Aside from their simple meaning, Hebrew words are also thought to contain mystical significance. For example, why do Jews feel a special affinity to the number 18? Through the study of "gematria," we are taught that 18 is equivalent to the Hebrew word "chai" – life. Gematria is the ancient Jewish form of numerology that assigns each letter of the Hebrew alphabet a numerical value. Jews look to the values of words and phrases to reveal hidden truths about Torah and Kabbalah. We know that lucky chai is 18 because the letter "chet" is equivalent to 8 and the "yud" is 10. While adding to 18 isn't too taxing, some gematria calculations can get quite elaborate. That's where Yale University's online Gematria Calculator comes in handy. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?11F462095] Just key in a series of letters and their values are displayed immediately. As for discovering the secrets hidden in the numbers, that's your challenge.

Rosh Hashanah is a month away and that likely means it's time to buy a new Jewish calendar. Although online Jewish calendars aren't as pretty as the ones you'll get from your bakery, there are some great Jewish calendars on the Web. The two best are Kaluach and Havienu L'Shalom's Month-at-a-Time Hebrew Calendar. Aside from converting dates between the Jewish and secular calendars, Havienu's also provides the weekly parshah and let's you decide whether to display words in "Ashkenazis" or "Sephardit." As well, when you choose from dozens of pre-set cities, it gives you Shabbat candlelighting times. And if you're spending time off the Jewish path, just plug in your longitude and latitude to get candlelighting times. [http://www.torah-bits.org/havienu/calendar/hebcalmonthview.html]

Kaluach does all that, but it also supplies you with the earliest and latest times you can recite certain prayers or put on tfillin. It also allows you to save your personal events on its server. Kaluach.net will display birthdays, anniversaries, and yahrzeits, and send you e-mail reminders. Unlike Havienu, Kaluach isn't free. Creator Yisrael Hersch has obviously put a lot of effort into his site and requests a "small payment" for its continued operation. [http://www.kaluach.net]

By the way, it seems Hersch has a sense of humour. While it's not unusual for software developers to include disclaimers or legal notes on their sites, I've never seen one quite like Hersch's: "Rabbi safe! No rabbis were harmed during the development of Kaluach."

Of Bay St. and Rabbi Mordechai Bengio St.

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Once, a long. long time ago, when Toronto was just a collection of clapboard shacks on the muddy shores of Lake Ontario, legend has it that a bear ran through one of its streets. That's how the street acquired the name Bear Street: in honour of the brown bear that rumbled through it.

With time and a bit of "Canajian" pronunciation, Bear Street became today's Bay Street.

A city's street names do more than identify addresses. They lay bare its folklore and express the history and heritage particular to that city.

History and heritage are things whose preservation, I believe, is very worthwhile. Evidently, the municipal authorities in my birthplace (and the birthplace of a sizeable number of other Canadian Jews) believe otherwise.

Tangiers, in what is now Morocco, on the tip of North Africa, was once a truly cosmopolitan and international city. It was governed by France, while at the same time greatly influenced by Spain. Once, many and varied European nationals called Tangiers home. The Jewish presence in Tangiers was also quite prominent.

The names of Tangiers' streets and boulevards once reflected this kaleidoscope. Up until recently, one could look up at the names on its street signs and quickly recognize the many influences and flavours that once made up this city.

This is, unfortunately, no longer the case. All street names that refer to Tangiers' international past have been replaced with solid Arabic names. But Tangiers did not just lose the names of streets. Its real loss was in losing its Europeans and its Jews.

Straddling the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, Tangiers was truly an international zone of commerce. On the African continent, but more a part of Europe, it was also a unique location where three faiths met in tolerance: Friday being sacred to Muslims, Saturdays to Jews, and Sundays to Christians.

Today, that busy sea port oozing with charm and character is no more. Long gone are the Europeans and the Jews. What remains is a small and dirty point on the map that is of little significance.

How sad.

As for myself, Tangiers' glorious past lives on in my mind. Irrespective of what the Arabs today might call the street of my childhood home, for me, it will always remain La Calle Goya. Likewise, my grandmother's house, where each week I romped with all my cousins on Shabbat afternoons, will always in my mind be located on La Place de France.

But most importantly, for me, the street in the Marchan neighbourhood that honoured the memory of my great-great-grandfather, the venerable leader of the "Tangerinos" Rabbi Mordechai Bengio, will, likewise, always retain his name.

For his memory lives on, as do the vivid memories of all those who lived in Tangiers during those wonderful years.

And no one can change that, for as much as people will try to erase, rewrite and revise it, history will prevail.

History in Israel for Cuba's Jewish community

By Dan Horowitz

For the first time ever, a group of young Cuban Jews has joined a birthright israel trip, through which qualifying 18- to 26-year-old participants experience 10 days in Israel at no cost. The project is financed by leading North American philanthropists and Jewish federations. UJA Federation campaign donations help to support the birthright israel program.

Six young men, two young women and two leaders recently left their native Cuba to join a Canada Israel Experience (CIE) birthright israel contingent. They flew first to Montego Bay, then on to London, England, before finally realizing their dream of landing in Tel Aviv.

Their grueling 30-hour trip was well worth the effort, according to William Miller, 27, one of the Cuban delegation leaders and the man who initiated contact with birthright israel in Toronto one year ago.

"It's incredible to be here today, talking to you in Israel," says Miller, whose grandfather Jose Miller, is the president of Cuba's Jewish community.

"A year ago, I sent an e-mail to birthright israel asking why Cuba was not part of the program. They told me to contact Canada Israel Experience in Toronto and I did. They had earlier sent a delegation to Cuba to learn about our Jewish community. When they received my e-mail, they were ready to help."

Funding for the Cuban participants came from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, UIA Federations Canada and the birthright israel organization. And the rest is history.

Cuban birthright israel participants Annette Ramos Eli, 22 (l), William Miller, 27, and Maria Louisa Delgado Zayon, 21, recently joined a group of Toronto participants for the journey of self-discovery.

"To be in Israel is a dream come true, not only for us, but for all of Cuba's Jews," says 22-year-old Annette Ramos Eli. "We are the pioneers for our friends and family in Cuba who someday hope to have the same experience."

The reality and emotion of the situation hit Annette hard as the plane approached Tel Aviv.

"My heart was beating so hard, so fast, I could not say anything. I could only cry with joy."

Maria Louisa Delgado Zayon, 21, echoed her friend's sentiment. "It is incredible," she says. "Cuba's Jewish community is not very big – only around 1,200 people – but it is a strong one. This experience will not only enrich our lives as Jews, but our whole community as well."

"When I saw the kotel (Western Wall) it did not seem real," adds Maria Louisa. "I could not believe that I, a Cuban girl, was standing there. Then, when I touched the Wall, I could not speak. There were so many people at the Wall, old and young, religious and not too religious, and that confirmed what I had always believed, that the Jewish world is very strong."

Charles Bronfman, the Canadian philanthropist who helped found the birthright israel program, recently delivered a message of hope and solidarity to participants in Jerusalem.

"In Israel, and in countries around the world, Jewish communities are thriving," Bronfman told the birthright israel contingent at Mount Herzel National Military cemetery. "We are thrilled to welcome our friends from Cuba today on birthright for the first time, thanks to the effort of Toronto. It is because of all of you that are here today that birthright israel lives. As you learn more about yourselves as Jews, and about your relationship with Israel, that will make the future for all of us that much stronger."

Dan Horowitz has just returned from a special assignment in Israel. His reports will appear in the August 28 and September 4 editions of Jewish Toronto.

legacy of life

Leon Weinstein 1908 - 1989

If ever there was a community event going on, chances are Leon Weinstein had a hand in it.

"My brother knew when things needed to be done and how they should be done," recalls Gus Weinstein of his older sibling. "His leadership capabilities were awesome. He really knew how and when to take charge."

Leon Weinstein, violinist extraordinaire, certainly had a knack for making things happen. He learned the grocery business from his father Sam, proprietor of the Red Star food store that eventually became Power Supermarkets. When Loblaw Cos. bought Power, Leon became president of the Loblaw supermarket chain. He created a President's Hotline so shoppers would have a voice and was the first to introduce ethnic foods into large grocery stores. He was a founder of Citytv and the Variety Club, and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. An active member of Holy Blossom Temple, Leon led UJA Federation's first mission to Israel in the late 1950s and held prominent roles with UJA, B'nai Brith, State of Israel Bonds, and Jewish National Fund.

"Leon loved people, violins, Toronto and the next Big Idea," says Moses Znaimer, co-founder of Citytv. "He was a great booster of the concept of local television as a vehicle for community involvement and volunteerism. As founding chairman, Leon lent his enthusiasm, contacts and, above all, his credibility to getting Citytv started. He was also a fabulous guy and great fun to be with."

All this because Leon loved people.

"My father had great charisma and he attracted people like magnets," says daughter Fran Goldman who, along with siblings Carol and Henry, was used to people like Danny Kaye, Phil Silvers and Jack Benny dropping by the house. "He had a wonderful sense of humour and a tremendously compassionate nature. Our home was always full of people from all walks of life because our parents created such a warm and welcoming environment."

Leon Weinstein

And people loved Leon right back, showing up at his Toronto home at all hours of the day to play music, tell a few jokes, or discuss political or social issues. Sometimes they stayed until the wee hours of the morning, but still Leon would be up at 5 a.m. so he could be among the first in line to buy fruit and vegetables for his stores.

This open door policy was something he learned from his parents Sam and Sarah, who were steeped in tzedakah (charity) and chesed (compassion) and raised their seven children to do the same. Leon wholeheartedly took up the challenge, with many of his kind words and gestures going unnoticed by his family until after his death when his wife Anne started receiving letters from people whom Leon had helped or inspired.

Leon never said no to requests for help or money, be it from the Jewish or secular communities. He gave his friend Ed Mirvish his first job, starting the man who would become Honest Ed off on a promising future in retail. A collector of antique instruments, Leon donated a 1771 Stradivarius violin to the Ontario Heritage Foundation so that Canada's aspiring young musicians would have a chance to live out their dreams. He was a member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) "even before anyone knew what it was," says daughter Carol Epstein, and was involved with the Toronto Chinese Business Association.

"Dad poured his heart into so many areas of his life, be it business, charity work, the violin or art," says Fran. "He was a great multi-tasker and he had a creative and energetic mind, which perhaps is why so many people turned to him for ideas. He helped start so many organizations, and he was such a kibitzer that people always responded positively to his requests for donations."

All this had a great impact on his family. Fran took to Holy Blossom Temple's Bikur Cholim (Sick and Visiting) Committee and founded the Canada-Israel Association for Child Protection, while Carol held leadership roles with numerous organizations in the 1970s including State of Israel Bonds, the Canadian offices of Bar Ilan University, Ben Gurion University, and Israel's Biotechnical Institute. She also helped her father raise funds to build a field hospital on the Israeli-Lebanese border.

"Not enough members of our community have a sense of community," says Gus, who traveled to Israel with Leon on that first mission. "Leon's wit, quickness and his sense of timing were impeccable, especially when it came to people. He took hold of the reins and made things happen."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who were exceptionally devoted to the community.

JEWISH TORONTO IS A PUBLICATION OF UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO.

UJA Federation Launches Campaign 2004

UJA Federation Campaign 2004 – For Israel and the Jewish World – led by Allan Silber, Richard Venn and Women's Campaign & Advocacy Chair Barbara Bregman – is officially underway, with a Community Launch August 20 at Toronto's Fairmont Royal York Hotel, featuring keynote speaker Malcolm Hoenlein, Executive Vice Chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Allan Silber (l) and Richard Venn (r), Chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, with Barbara Bregman, Chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy.

The Campaign, which has already raised $17.4 million, follows on the heels of last year's record $65 million Israel Emergency Campaign.

Responding to a changing and insecure Jewish world, Campaign 2004 will continue and extend emergency assistance through allocations to three priority areas:

- Strengthening Israel's weakened social service network
- Combating a growing wave of worldwide anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred
- Providing Jewish high school and university students with the tools to defend Israel and counter intimidation on campus

"Over the last few years, we have all witnessed dramatic changes in our Jewish world," says Silber. "Our concern for Israel is compounded by strident worldwide forces preaching anti-Semitic hatred, thinly disguised as anti-Israel rhetoric," he adds, noting that anti-Semitism is quickly becoming an accepted cultural norm, particularly in Europe.

Specific areas to which Campaign 2004 donations will be allocated include payments to young people who have lost one or more parents in a terror attack; support for trauma centres, summer camps, day care facilities, after-school programs and services for Israel's most vulnerable; building partnerships with non-Jewish community leaders through the new Israel Emergency Cabinet in order to counteract the ongoing spread of anti-Israel hatred; and powerful Israel experience programs with life-long impact for young people, such as birthright israel.

Campaign 2004 will feature a multitude of events and speakers, including the upcoming Israel Today Speaker Series, with briefings by distinguished guest lecturers from Israel and around the world, including David Horovitz, editor of The Jerusalem Report, Israel Defense Forces military analyst Colonel Miri Eisen, and U.S. foreign policy expert Michael Ledeen. Monthly missions to Israel are continuing as a show of solidarity during these difficult times.

"Our community holds Israel and the Jewish world deep in our hearts," says Venn. "We are remarkable because we have the vision to look beyond our borders. We quickly recognize crisis and we confront it with generosity, confidence and determination. That's what we have to do now," he adds.

In a June 19 2003 CJN supplement, Jewish Canada, published by UIA Federations Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, material was excerpted from a series of demographic studies published by the McGill Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning, and authored by Professor Jim Torczyner. Profiles In Courage

Three women whose lives represent the issues on which UJA Federation Campaign 2004 will be focusing recently spoke to campaign volunteers.

Surviving Terror
Gila Aluf, Jerusalem

Gila Aluf

The courage of Gila Aluf, a recently widowed mother of five from the Jerusalem suburb of Gilo, was clear as she recounted the horrible events of just over a year ago when her husband was killed by a suicide bomber aboard a bus heading to Jerusalem.

"Unfortunately, I am now part of the big family of Israel's victims of terror because my husband was killed in a terrorist attack. Now, I am a mother and a father to our five children," she said.

"Since then, my family has ups and downs, like the waves of the sea, but it is because of the support from the Diaspora – people like you here in Toronto – that we feel we are not alone. We have a connection – as Jews – that gives us strength."

The family received financial support from the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) Victims of Terror Fund, and each of her children received a grant from the JAFI Orphan Fund, which they can access at the age of 21. These funds are directly supported by UJA Federation annual campaigns.

"These funds are so important," she said. "They give us hope. When they are 21 years old, my kids will use that money that is now in the bank, maybe for an apartment, maybe to get married. All of them will use it to make their lives better."

Fleeing Hatred
Clara Beilor, Paris

Clara Beilor

When Clara Beilor, 26, speaks about making aliyah from her native France, it becomes clear that France's loss is Israel's gain.

"I cannot tell you what an incredible feeling it is now to wake up each morning in a country where you belong, a country where you no longer have to justify being a Jew. There has not been a single day since making aliyah that I have regretted my decision," she said.

"I simply could no longer live in a country where my friends who wore kippot were attacked, yelled at, or spat on for no other reason that they were Jews," she noted.

Beilor credited JAFI for making her aliyah an especially successful one, but she is not so optimistic when it comes to the future of Jews in France.

"I don't think there is any life, any future, in France," she said. It's an incredible feeling to see Toronto's Jewish community with billboards and posters for UJA, which is openly raising money for Israel. In France, those signs would be set on fire."

Empowering a New Jewish Generation
Aliza Libman, Toronto

Aliza Libman

For many Jewish university students, the challenge of responding to attacks against Israel and confronting intimidation on campus is a daily occurrence – one with which Aliza Libman is all too familiar.

"Many people say that the problems of the Middle East are far away and isolated in that part of the world," says Libman, a student at Toronto's York University. "For me however, those problems are only nine minutes away – the time it takes me to get to York every day."

Libman is one of Canada's university students who has witnessed – firsthand – a significant resurgence of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism on Canadian campuses.

"Over the last year, I have noticed a significant change in the atmosphere on campus," said Libman, 19. "Jewish students are feeling more intimidated and anxious than ever when it comes to standing up for what they believe. They need the answers and training necessary to take a proud stand in support of Israel and the Jewish world." And, often, she added, faculty members are the problem.

"I can understand some professors wanting to talk about politics, but I don't agree with them dictating their beliefs to students in class," she explained. "It's wrong, it's inappropriate, and it makes people uncomfortable."

Cyclist rides across Canada for heart fund

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

These days, you're much more likely to find Jeremy Brans travelling along the winding backroads of the Canadian countryside than sitting in a Second Cup in downtown Toronto.

Sporting about six weeks worth of facial hair as he sits for an interview, the 27-year-old sheepishly admits that he's drinking his first cup of coffee in more than a month.

Brans is in the middle of realizing a lifelong dream of cycling more than 7,500 kilometres from Vancouver to St. John's, Nfld. He began his journey June 14 and aims to finish at the end of August.

Taking a one-day break in his hometown, he has just enough time for a bike tune-up and an interview.

Brans says he's had a passion for cycling since his dad first taught him how to ride without training wheels. His father, an avid cyclist, suffered a stroke more than a year ago.

By biking across Canada, Brans hopes to raise $10,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation. So far he has collected $6,000. People can make pledges and track his progress on his Web site (www.whereisjer.com).

When I ask, Brans pauses for several seconds to consider what it is he loves about cycling.

"It's just so amazing that a human being can propel themselves that far without depending on anything," he finally says.

Brans had to pack light for his three-month trip. A small panier he attached above the back wheel of his bike holds his pack and tent. He said the total weight of his belongings is about 40-60 lbs.

Brans says he has also had to modify his eating habits since "the biggest fear is running out of juice."

While the average male consumes about 2,000 calories a day, Brans must eat more than triple that amount. Each day he eats six meals consisting of carbohydrate-rich foods such as pasta.

"You would think one of the the cool things about it is that you could eat whatever you want. It actually becomes such a chore," says a wiry and lean Brans.

While most people would expect the Rockies to be the hardest stretch, Brans says he found the Prairies much more punishing.

To amuse himself during the "large patches of nothingness," Brans says he began to talk with cows in nearby fields. When he rode by, he would moo and watch as the cattle turned their heads.

Besides boredom, another low point of the Prairies was being at the mercy of fierce winds. When headwinds blew against his bike, Brans said he would crawl at about 15 kilometres per hour, as opposed to the usual 25 to 30.

On days when the winds blew in his direction, Brans could do "200 kilometres without blinking."

Another thing Brans didn't expect to find was the brutally steep terrain north of Lake Superior.

"I would compare it to some of the hardest days in the Rockies," he says.

Jeremy Brans

Brans says his favourite part of his trip so far has been exchanging stories with fellow cyclers.

"I'm always happiest when I have a good chat with someone," he says.

At the end of each day, he meets up with his biking partner Tovi Heilbron to rest and talk, but he and Tovi cycle alone most of the time.

Brans usually asks farmers in the area if he can camp out on their lawns. He says he's met some fascinating people this way.

"In Toronto, you're really isolated from what the rest of Canada is really like," he says.

Brans and Heilbron experienced the kind and helpful nature of small-town Canadians when they got into an accident four hours outside of Winnipeg.

Brans was riding closely in front of Heilbron on the highway's narrow shoulder. When Brans stopped his bike suddenly, Heilbron slammed into his back tire and both tumbled onto the pavement.

While Heilbron went to a hospital get stitches on his chin, Brans hitched a ride to Winnipeg to fix his back tire, "which had basically disintegrated."

The bike shop refused to take Brans' money and almost every car pulled over to offer him a ride.

"If you ever want to hitchhike across Canada, just bring a bike and leave it on the side of the road and wave as if you're helpless. Everyone stops," he says.

After his stopover in Toronto, Brans is planning to spend a day or two in Ottawa and Quebec City. He says he is looking forward to seeing the Plains of Abraham and the Chateau Frontenac.

"It's like relearning all your Grade 8 history," he says.

Next he's following the Gaspé Peninsula out to the Maritimes.

He will return to his job as a management consultant, from which he took four months of unpaid leave, at the end of August.

For Brans, cycling is an ideal way to see the country.

"One of the greatest times of day is when the sun is kind of setting and you've got a tailwind, and you're cycling down a farm road, no cars around, and you kind of look to the side and you see the shadow of your legs pumping up and down. It's like seeing a mirror. You see the road ahead of you and you say, 'Wow. I'm going to St. John's.'"

Web site provides support for bereaved parents

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Spencer Kalpin died five years ago at age 20 months, his parents Leslie and Randy searched for resources to help them deal with their loss.

"We found very little out there for parents who have lost a child, and even less for children who have lost a sibling. It's a unique type of loss," they said.

Feeling alone and without support services, they formed the BabySteps Children's Fund, a not-for-profit organization dedicated to increasing awareness around the issues of child loss and bereavement.

As well, the Kalpins, who have three children – including one who was born after Spencer's death – created a Web site, www.babysteps.com, "in the hope that no parents, sibling, grandparent, uncle, aunt, cousin or friend would ever feel alone as we did," Leslie said.

The name, she said, comes from the baby steps that form the "long and difficult road to recovery from the loss of a child."

As a source of information and consolation for the bereaved, babysteps.com brings together personal stories, pictures, books and book reviews, a memorial area and reference materials to a single reference point.

"It's intended to be a referral, information and support site, and we invite families to submit stories related to their loss. We know that the path to healing is accomplished through sharing sorrow with other people," said Randy, who owns a computer business.

"There is a lot of sadness in the world, and it helps us to know that we can do something. The BabySteps site allows people to acknowledge their loss in a positive way. We know we're getting a wide audience, because we've had people write in at least 30 languages."

He said that an "intertwined, yet separate Web site" is the on-line gift shop at www.babystepsgiftshop.com, which offers personalized baby and children's gifts, and a line of personalized chocolate bars and assorted candy.

All proceeds from the sale of gifts are earmarked for the Spencer Kalpin Memorial Foundation at the Hospital for Sick Children.

"It is a win-win situation. People are buying great gifts, and all money goes towards research.

"This isn't just another sad story. We have a purpose. We hope to reach out to a large number of people who need us," said Leslie, who has promoted the gift line at gift shows and on Rogers Cable.

The Jewish community has been very supportive of their project, she said, "and we keep getting busier and busier. It gives people a good feeling to give to charity, and it gives me something positive to works towards," she said.

Gifts, which can be shipped anywhere in North America or abroad, include a step stool or treasure chest with a child's name in removable letters, a baby or school memory picture frame, hair brushes, pillows, and a coat rack.

"It's a mixed bag," Randy said. "We're promoting the enjoyment of life, on a backdrop of bereavement and sadness."

מה יהיה

The Color of Water בת שבע קוין

סרטים שיעשו לכם טוב

"גידי שלום. שמתי לב שאתה ממלץ בחום על סרטים שונים וגם יצא לי ללכת לסרטים אחרי ההמלצה שלך וזה היה בּוּל קלֹעה. אבל מה, אתה לא רואה לפעמים סרטים גרועים? נִיר יאצקי, טורונטו"

אז הינה כמה סרטים שיעשו לכם את הקיץ טוב יותר:

Sea Biscuit הוא סיפורו האמיתי של סוס מרוץ משנות השלושים שנחשב לוֶּר בשל מגבלותיו הגופניות, והרוכב שלו שנחשב לוֶּר עוד יותר גדול, ואיך שניהם מצליחים לכבוש את אמריקה. סרט מאוד הוליוודי. התחלה נראית קצת כמו סרט היסטורי שטחי- אבל החמשך נוגע ללב, מרתק ומצחיל נפלא. שמונה בסולם קורן.

On Campus

Peace is the word for national campus group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Earlier this year, the Israel Emergency Cabinet, under the auspices of UIA Federations Canada (UIUAFC), allocated $1 million for the 2003/2004 year to fund Israel advocacy initiatives at Canadian universities.

Students will begin to see the results as early as September, according to Lance Davis, 32, director of national Jewish campus life at UIAFC.

UIA's former young leadership director, Davis took on his newly created position in May. A PhD student in modern Jewish thought and social theory at the University of Toronto, Davis worked with Jewish Campus Services (now Hillel of Greater Toronto) from 1995 to 2000.

The new funding, he said, has empowered UIAFC "to be a central resource to the [more than two dozen] campuses across the country and to ensure that action takes place on campus vis-à-vis the Middle East conflict."

The funding, which is over and above the more than $500,000 already allocated to campuses, was a response to a rise in anti-Israel sentiment and activity at Canadian post-secondary institutions, it was announced at the time.

In addition to Davis' job, the funding is underwriting three new staff positions at Hillel Toronto and one each at its counterparts in Montreal, London, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

The money will also go toward staff training, programming for students, funding and Israel programming for student leaders, as well as a Web site that will serve as a student resource, and a Jewish campus life guidebook that is expected to be published in October.

Buildings for Jewish campus groups are also on the agenda. National Jewish Campus Life chair Barbara Bank has worked with philanthropist Albert Latner to develop student facilities in Waterloo, London and Halifax, said Davis. The latter two facilities are expected to open formally this fall.

Davis estimates that only about 5 per cent of Jewish students on campus are what he calls "hard-core" Israel advocates.

"The overwhelming majority of Jews aren't there, and to some degree they're turned off by the rhetoric on both sides. They don't want to be engaged in Israel through politics, but through other things that speak to them, such as music, art, culture and comedy – things that people would be proud to bring their non-Jewish roommate to."

With that in mind, UIAFC's national Jewish campus life department is launching its initial project in mid-September: a cross-Canada campus tour by an Israeli DJ from a Tel Aviv club and an Israeli visual artist who has videotaped scenes from Israeli life reflecting the multicultural, ethnic aspect of Israel.

"We're going to be demonstrating that Israel's a hip, cool place to be," Davis said.

The event, which kicks off in Toronto Sept. 13, will be known as a Party for Peace, reflecting the new initiative's year-long theme of peace. Davis credits local campus staff in different cities for the idea.

"We want to demonstrate that Israel is rooted in peace," said Davis.

He hopes to end the year with a cross-country "peace train" that would bring students from different campuses together, with stops at campuses across the country for programming along the way.

Other initiatives include outreach to non-Jewish student groups on campus, including a subsidized trip to Israel for non-Jewish "friends of Israel."

"Getting students [to] feel positive about Israel isn't going to make things perfect, but it's a step in the right direction," said Davis.

This will be a challenging year, he said, referring to the task of "engaging" roughly double the usual number of first-year students because of the double cohort of Grade 12 and OAC students from Ontario who are entering university next month.

The phasing out of the final high school year will have a ripple effect across the country, with more Ontario students going to university out of province. "We're expecting increases in places like British Columbia and Alberta, and as far east as Halifax," Davis said. "We've increased the allocations to a variety of schools, especially in Ontario, to give them more money to do more programs for more numbers."

Ideally, said Davis, he would like to see peace in Israel. "I want the conflict in the Middle East to feel like ancient history and for us to get down to the work of enhancing Jewish identity and creating a Jewish campus community that's vibrant and exciting."

67 year old loses 20 pounds

"I've slimmed down from a large size 16 (or sometimes even an 18!) to a comfortable size 12. I lost 20 pounds of excess baggage in five months, effortlessly. I even lost weight while on vacation!

Right from the first time I came into the Positive Changes office, I felt comfortable. No pushing or pressure to join.

I used to feel bloated and blimpy when I ate too much. I don't overeat anymore so I don't get that feeling. I eat the right portions. I feel smaller, which is wonderful. Now I have no more cravings. I'm in control!

We all spend money on "stuff"; this was for my personal health and well being. I lost weight but I gained a lot of knowledge about myself. It has been invaluable. I know these changes will last a lifetime because with hypnosis, I changed my habits. It wasn't a diet.

I am totally happy in my life now. Call Positive Changes today for a free consultation so you can realize your happiness too."

Why don't journalists report the facts?

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

How difficult is it for journalists to unambiguously establish basic facts?

Several years ago, at a CBC forum titled "Journalism and the Politics of Identity," the highly respected Canadian writer and academic Michael Ignatieff expressed the reporter's obligation well when he cautioned journalists against equating objectivity with including balanced statements from both sides of a conflict.

"Refuse the relativization of truth," he argued. "There are facts, they can be established, they can be discerned, they can be presented."

In reporting on Israel's recent limited military action against Hezbollah bases in southern Lebanon ("Israel strikes Lebanon after town shelled," Toronto Star, Aug. 11), Associated Press (AP) reporter Gavin Rabinowitz was very fair, emphasizing that Israel attempted to exercise restraint in the face of mounting Hezbollah attacks across the northern border. Nevertheless, like many other journalists, Rabinowitz referred to the Shebaa Farms area ("Har Dov" in Israeli terms) – the scene of Hezbollah artillery fire on Israeli troops on Aug. 8 – as "disputed" land. But as Rabinowitz's very next sentence reveals, there is no dispute: "Shebaa Farms is part of the occupied Golan Heights seized from Syria in the 1967 Middle East war." (Emphasis added.)

Indeed, the international community, through UN certification, has established that Shebaa Farms is not Lebanese territory, thus depriving Hezbollah of any valid rationale for attacking Israeli troops. The fact that Hezbollah, along with Lebanon and Syria, claims Shebaa Farms to be part of Lebanon proves only that Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, is desperate to find a reason for its violent activities, not that Shebaa Farms is "disputed."

Reporting for BBC World (seen on CBC Newsworld) on Aug. 10, James Rodgers said: "The renewed hostilities on the Israeli-Lebanese border began on [Aug. 8] after seven months of calm. Hezbollah shelled Israeli army posts in Shebaa Farms, an area which they claim is Lebanese territory." Missing was any reference either to what Israel claims or, more important, to what the UN, has determined to be the case.

Even the National Post, in an article cobbled together from AP, Reuters and Agence France-Presse ("Israel Bombs Hezbollah in Lebanon," Aug. 11), included the following: "[On Aug. 8], Israel and Hezbollah exchanged artillery fire over a disputed area near the confluence of the Syrian, Lebanese and Israeli borders…" Again, no mention was made of the fact that the UN has declared this region – a very small area – to belong to Syria, not to Lebanon.

Speaking of facts, in his otherwise excellent report from Syria, the Globe and Mail's Alan Freeman ("Syria's foreign policy caught in bygone era," Aug. 11) writes, "Damascus still refuses to condemn such groups as the Palestinian Hamas, or Hezbollah, which controls southern Lebanon, even though the Americans see them as terrorists."

Freeman doesn't mention that far from failing to condemn Hezbollah, Syria is actively promoting it, in flagrant violation of UN Security Council Resolution 425 (March 19, 1978). UN Resolution 425 calls on the Lebanese government to take control of the south and also calls "for strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries." Israel complied fully by unilaterally withdrawing from its southern security zone in Lebanon in May 2000. Syria, which occupies Lebanon, remains in violation of Resolution 425 to this day – while, ironically, presiding over the UN Security Council this month as its president.

Israeli youth orchestra visits Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Close to 400 people jammed the concert hall of the Soloway Jewish Community Centre for a sold-out performance by the Kfar Saba Youth Orchestra during their visit to Ottawa earlier this month.

Before heading to Montreal on its North American tour, the 50-piece ensemble of teenage musicians performed at three different venues during its first-ever visit to the nation's capital. A Sunday afternoon performance in the amphitheatre of the National Gallery preceded the SJCC concert later that evening.

Under the direction of conductor Rafi Primo, the musicians performed a varied repertoire of classical, folk and popular songs, including My Yiddishe Mama and Fiddler on the Roof.

After the concert, plaques of appreciation were given to Primo and Evgeni Weinbrand, the orchestra's second conductor, who was "discovered" by Primo while working as a security guard in a parking garage in Tel Aviv. He had been a high-ranking officer in the Russian army as well as an orchestra conductor.

Kfar Saba, a town of about 75,000 people, is northeast of Tel Aviv. The youth orchestra is run by the Kfar Saba Music Foundation, which provides music education in the city's schools and supports its youth bands and music groups. The orchestra has performed throughout the world, including at the White House.

Their visit was sponsored by the Vered Israel Cultural & Educational Program, the Friends of the 39th Ottawa Scout Troop, the Embassy of Israel and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation. The musicians were billeted with local families.

Naturalization records for 1915-32 now online

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

People doing research on relatives who became Canadian citizens in the early 20th century now have an online resource that is part of a federal government Web site.

The Canadian Genealogy Centre has launched a new database that contains references to about 200,000 immigrants from 84 countries outside the British Commonwealth who applied for and received status as naturalized Canadians from 1915 to 1932. The information is searchable by surname, given name and country. A search can also be done using possible name variations.

The database was created in partnership with the Jewish genealogical societies of Montreal and Ottawa (JGS). The Canadian Genealogy Centre, a joint service of the National Library and National Archives of Canada, provides electronic access to the country's genealogical resources.

The Montreal JGS was responsible for the digitization of the new database and the Ottawa group funded it.

Montreal JGS president Stanley Diamond said the data was collected through annually published government records known as the Secretary of State sessional papers, which were previously almost unknown to the public. Some 4,000 pages in total, they were available in only a few libraries in crumbling unindexed volumes across the country. Some of them are in microform, which is laborious to use.

Diamond described the records as a "gold mine" for genealogists and other researchers, particularly those with Jewish ancestors. The JGS estimates that about 40 per cent of the 200,000 persons listed are Jewish.

"This was the period of the highest rate of Jewish immigration. Although religion is not included, the countries of origin, like Poland and Russia, and the names we've seen so far, make us confident that 40 per cent is not too high," he said. Those emigrating from Great Britain or elsewhere in the Commonwealth did not need to be naturalized before 1947.

Most of the digitized pages include, in addition to the name of the applicant and country of origin, names of wives and children, date the certificate was issued or the oath of allegiance taken, occupation, residence and certificate number and series. With this last information, an Access to Information request can be sent to Citizenship and Immigration Canada for the entire naturalization file on the person, including any RCMP security investigations.

The reports are useful to those whose ancestors came earlier than 1915 as well, Diamond points out. Five years' residency was required to apply for naturalization.

"We have found that many waited 10, 15 or even 20 years to apply," said Diamond. "My uncle Sam, who came to Montreal in 1898 at about age nine from Poland, didn't became a citizen until 1923 – 25 years later – when he was moving to the United States and needed it." Naturalization was not mandatory.

The process that led to the database project began in 1997. Diamond was alerted to the existence of the sessional papers by political science professor Mel Himes, who had found them in a McGill University library. Although he is a veteran genealogist, Diamond had not heard of them, but he was excited by the news.

"Up to now, there were no publicly available documents related to Canadian naturalizations. All one could do was send in a request to the government and hope for a positive reply. Often genealogists are told the papers cannot be found, or they are frustrated because they do not know their ancestor's original name or spelling."

Alan Greenberg, a retired McGill computer science professor and Montreal JGS executive member, was asked to do a preliminary spreadsheet of some of the data and saw the possibilities.

The National Library put Diamond in touch with its systems librarian, Donna Dinberg, who is also a volunteer with the Ottawa JGS. She knew about the papers through Lawrence Tapper, a longtime archivist at the National Archives and founding president of the Ottawa JGS in 1995.

Tapper recognized the records' value to genealogists, but at the time, the technology to make them usable online was not readily available. In March 1997, Dinberg and Tapper proposed to the National Library that it collaborate with the JGS in making the information accessible to the public. The library liked the idea but did not have the manpower to undertake the project.

Diamond learned that the government did not publicize the print volumes because they are liable to be damaged by frequent handling due to their fragility. The two genealogical societies understood this fear and did not broadcast the news of their "discovery" either.

The genealogical societies decided to take on the project themselves, not realizing the technical challenges. Scanning the microforms proved disappointing. The scanned paper version was also unsatisfactory, and expensive.

Finally, the Montreal JGS, through Greenberg, reached an agreement with McGill's rare books and special collections division, which had recently purchased state-of-the-art, camera-based scanning equipment that would not injure the delicate book bindings.

Costs would be reasonable because students did the actual scanning in the summer of 2001. Diamond's wife Ruth did the indexing of first and last names.

The genealogical societies agreed that the data and images would be a gift to a Canadian institution. Then they had to find a host Web site.

At the same time, the National Library and Archives were setting up the Canadian Genealogy Centre, which was launched this past March. When they were approached about the new database, they were enthusiastic; this was the type of co-operation with community groups they were looking for. The agreement reached last September was, in fact, their first with a genealogy society.

"Knowing that our efforts will be of benefit to genealogists of all backgrounds for years to come gives us a sense of pride and fulfilment," Diamond said. "We hope others will be inspired to find hidden or not easily accessible resources and to follow our path."

A second phase of the project, to digitize the records from 1933 to 1951, is now under discussion, Diamond said.

Lebanese ambassador's comments anger community leaders

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Community leaders are pressing Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham to take action against Lebanon's Ambassador to Canada after the envoy made what Canadian Jewish Congress calls "reprehensible comments" about Jews for the second time in less than a year.

Raymond Baaklini recently told a weekly Arabic language newspaper in Montreal that the media's "exaggeration" about Lebanon's arrest of Canadian missionary Bruce Balfour, who is charged with collaborating with Israel, was due to the fact the Canadian news media is controlled by pro-Israel owners.

Last December, Baaklini similarly commented that Ottawa outlawed the terrorist group Hezbollah because of pressure from a "Zionist party" that he said "controls 90 per cent of Canadian media."

Graham met with the ambassador in January after CJC requested that an appropriate reprimand be administered, "but at that time, Baaklini did not retract his comments about Jews, and only regretted that his comments caused offence and that they created a controversy," CJC said last week in statement.

"It is unacceptable for a foreign envoy to make disparaging comments about a particular community in a host country," said Moshe Ronen, chair of CJC's board of governors.

"Mr. Baaklini must stop overstepping his diplomatic boundaries immediately and abide by Canadian norms of civility in public discourse," Ronen said.

Graham must "make it crystal clear that if Ambassador Baaklini cannot refrain from making prejudiced allegations, he is unwelcome to represent his country in Canada," Ronen said.

Rochelle Wilner, president of B'nai Brith Canada, called on the government to expel Baaklini.

"These comments mirror the ones he made last winter... Even if he doesn't use the word 'Jewish' this time round, we all know what he's talking about," Wilner said in a statement.

"It's obvious that [he] learned nothing from his meeting after the last time he made offensive comments like this. He's had his chance. Now it's time for him to go back to Lebanon," she said.

Representatives in Graham's office could not be reached for comment by The CJN's deadline.

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN 2004

An urgent campaign is underway

The Challenge We Face

We, as Jews, live in a dramatically different and dangerous world. A world in which Israel is struggling to combat terror, pursue peace and fund social services during a crippling recession. A world in which millions are overcome by virulent anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment. A world in which there is no guarantee that our children will be living in a secure environment. Consider this:

- Over 5400 Israelis are dealing with terror-related injuries.

- An estimated 40% of Israel's children suffer from some form of post-traumatic stress disorder.

- The current Israeli recession is the worst in Israel's history. Nearly 300,000 Israelis are out of work, government benefits have been cut and most Israelis report a reduced standard of living.

- The number of violent anti-Semitic incidents around the world rose by 36% last year.

- Many Canadian university students face constant anti-Israel intimidation on campus.

Together We're Stronger

Our Response:
The Global Jewish Action Plan

The challenges confronting today's Jewish world are truly daunting. In response, UJA Federation Campaign 2004 is expanding the emergency projects that we funded last year. All contributions beyond those required for our core needs will be allocated to these three strategic initiatives:

1 Financial support for Israel's deteriorating social service network, including additional help for children whose parents were killed in terror attacks.

2 Stepped up efforts to combat a worldwide wave of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred, through the new national Israel Emergency Cabinet.

3 Education and training for our next Jewish generation to answer those who preach anti-Israel hatred.

About Food

Writer Judy Gruen and I had our first culinary connection when she called from California several months ago to order a copy of my cookbook MealLeaniYumm! She was looking for easy, healthy recipes in her quest for thinness and a friend had recommended my book to her. When she told me she was writing a book called Till We Eat Again: Confessions of a Diet Dropout, I asked her to send me a review copy.

What a terrific read! Written in diary form, it is a hilarious account of her struggles with trying to lose 15 pounds for a college reunion. Judy pokes fun at herself and the diet industry, describing her adventures with various health food and exercise fanatics, personal trainers, exercise videos, Weight Watchers, exercise boot camp, boxing classes, health clubs such as Flab-No-More, belly dancing and… strip aerobics.

"I really did virtually everything I wrote about, with the exception of the strip aerobics, which I was too chicken to do!" Judy says.

"Everything else I really did, and I couldn't have written about it otherwise."

Till We Eat Again: Confessions of a Diet Dropout will make you laugh out loud at the crazy things people do when trying to lose weight. Thank goodness laughing burns calories – I lost three pounds by "laughing my weigh" through Judy's weight-loss adventures! You can get your own copy through www.judygruen.com or www.amazon.ca.

Till We Eat Again doesn't contain recipes, so I asked Judy to share one of her favourites for my column. She adapted this delicious salad from Jane Brody's Good Food Book. The original recipe called for 3 cups of cooked rice, but Judy substituted soba (buckwheat) noodles. She omitted the dry mustard and radishes, increased the oil and vinegar and added Chinese five spice to the dressing.

Judy says, "I like this kind of recipe because you can easily substitute other vegetables of your choice. I am also likely to add diced red pepper and jicama, for color, texture and flavour. My kids love baby corn, so I might toss that in. You can make this recipe your own by playing with the contents, but the dressing really is what makes it special. So don't be chicken and enjoy."

ORIENTAL CHICKEN AND PASTA SALAD

Salad:

2 cups cooked slivered chicken breasts (tip: marinating breasts first adds flavour)
16 oz. soba noodles (available in health food stores; or you can substitute your favourite pasta)
1 cup sliced celery
1 cup bean sprouts
½ cup sliced scallions
¼ lb. snow peas, blanched for one minute, then cut diagonally
1 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds
1 cup watercress or other hearty greens

Dressing:

3 tbsp. reduced-sodium soy sauce
3 tbsp. rice vinegar or white wine vinegar
2 tbsp. Oriental sesame oil
2 tbsp. salad oil
1 tbsp. minced fresh ginger (fresh ginger has a special kick)
2 cloves minced garlic
½ tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. ground black pepper
¼ tsp. Chinese five spice powder

Combine all dressing ingredients. Add cooked slivered chicken and let stand at least 30 minutes.

Add all other salad ingredients, except for the greens. Toss salad. Add greens just before serving, and toss again. Serves four generously.

More than 5,000 celebrate at Birthright Israel gala in Jerusalem

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM — The festivities actually began an hour before the big event last week as 5,500 Birthright Israel participants began filing into Jerusalem's International Convention Centre for a spectacular party.

Loud chants of "Israel, Israel" echoed across the convention centre parking lot. The auditorium itself was an overwhelming sea of blue and white as Jewish young adults from 21 countries, including 500 from Canada, celebrated their stay in Israel. The Canadians hoisted a huge maple leaf flag when their delegation was announced.

This summer has been the most successful ever for Canadian participation in Birthright Israel. Between May and the end of August this year, 1,600 young people from Canada will have joined a Birthright Israel experience, which offers free trips to Israel to students who have never been to Israel before on an organized tour.

The Birthright gala featured Prime Minister Ariel Sharon; Natan Sharansky, the Israeli cabinet minister responsible for Diaspora relations; Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, the philanthropists who founded Birthright Israel; Jewish Agency chair Sallai Meridor and the music of Gaya, one of Israel's hottest bands, which contributed to the electric atmosphere inside the room.

After extending his condolences to the families of those who were killed in two suicide bombings that day, Sharon acknowledged the presence of Birthright's first-ever Cuban delegation, made possible by Canada Israel Experience, UIA Federations Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"I had some worries on my mind before tonight," Sharon said. "But seeing all of you, I have no worries. I am still optimistic because of you. For many, this is your first visit to Israel, but I am sure that it will not be your last."

"Israel is not only an Israeli project, it is a worldwide Jewish project," Sharon added. "All of you are responsible for what happens here in the future, and what happens here will affect Jewish life around the world."

"It was a sad day in Israel today, but your presence here tonight shows what Israel is all about, that we will never give up. Am Yisrael Chai," Meridor said.

"This is just incredible. It's an absolute outpouring of Judaism. Everyone in this auditorium tonight is rejoicing in being Jewish. This celebration – just like Birthright Israel itself – surpassed all expectations. Tonight shows that all Jews belong in Israel," said a barely audible Daniel Rotman, 19, from Toronto.

"I got shivers just by being here tonight," said an overwhelmed Rinat Coren, 21, also of Toronto. "The feeling of celebrating my life as a Jew with thousands of other proud Jews is really too much to put into words."

Dan Horowitz is senior communications co-ordinator for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

More than 5,000 Birthright Israel participants, including 500 from Canada, celebrated together last week. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the young crowd that they make him feel optimistic about his country's future. [Israel photo]

Pollard to get a day in court in latest twist of famous spy case

By EDWIN BLACK
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Sept. 2, 2003 will be a big day for Jonathan Pollard: that's the day the American Jewish spy is going to get another day in court.

Pollard's lawyers will have 40 minutes in a U.S. court to explain why they should be permitted to continue efforts to rescind the life sentence he received 18 years ago for committing espionage for Israel.

Years of tenacious motions by attorneys Jacques Semmelman and Eliot Lauer either have been vigorously opposed by government attorneys or allowed to languish in the court.

Now U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Hogan has granted Pollard and his attorneys – who are working on the case pro bono – a hearing.

Semmelman and Lauer will get 30 minutes to argue why they should be permitted to appeal, the government can take a half hour to respond, and then Pollard's attorneys will be granted 10 minutes for the last word.

So pivotal is the hearing that the judge has ordered federal prison officials in Butner, N.C., to shuttle Pollard to the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., for the event.

Prison officials said they are uncertain whether U.S. marshals would fly Pollard to the nation's capital or drive.

"Normally, we drive them for a mere six-hour trip," a prison spokesperson said, "but a high-profile prisoner like Pollard might be flown."

He added that arrangements would be made for Pollard's kosher meals.

Despite mounds of legal briefs and well-researched citations, Pollard's hearing boils down to two issues:

- Was the ex-naval intelligence officer convicted in March 1987 on the basis of a misleading secret 46-page affidavit?
- Was he denied due process by a defence attorney who declined to file a routine appeal after Judge Aubrey Robinson stunned Pollard and threw a crowded courtroom into pandemonium with an unexpected life sentence? The life sentence violated the prosecutor's plea agreement to not ask for life in exchange for Pollard's co-operation.

Then-U.S. secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger submitted the secret affidavit at virtually the last minute at Robinson's personal request.

In the affidavit, Weinberger wrote: "It is difficult for me, in the so-called 'year of the spy' to conceive of a greater harm to national security."

The message, backed up with some 20 classified documents, was clear: Give Pollard a life sentence – regardless of the written plea agreement.

Fifteen years later, Weinberger conceded that "the Pollard matter was comparatively minor. It was made far bigger than its actual importance."

Pressed on why this was so, Weinberger replied, "I don't know why – it just was."

Attorneys Semmelman and Lauer have been filing motion after motion to see the supposedly secret documents so they can adequately appeal.

But their efforts have been denied on the grounds of national security, even though they have been granted the necessary security clearances. Semmelman is a former U.S. attorney. The documents concern sources and methods used two decades ago, before the proliferation of personal computers.

The second question asks whether Pollard was denied due process on account of "ineffective assistance of counsel," according to the motion.

Pollard's attorney at the time, Richard Hibey, has been widely criticized for inaction. He failed to object when prosecutors violated the plea agreement and asked for life, failed to call for an evidentiary hearing on Weinberger's secret affidavit, and then – to the surprise of most observers – declined to file the routine notice of appeal in the 10 days allotted.

For years, Hibey has dodged all questions on his representation of Pollard.

Despite the hearing, there are few prospects for a Pollard release in the immediate future.

Even if Semmelman and Lauer were granted the opportunity to appeal – consistently denied because Hibey failed to file the 10-day notice – it might take another year or two for any decision.

Pollard already has served far longer than the average for people convicted of spying either for enemies of the United States or its allies.

Aliyah from Argentina slows down as country's economic crisis eases

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — At the beginning of the year, Adriana Faerman filled out every application at the local office of the Jewish Agency for Israel, planning to leave her native Argentina for Israel.

The painter, sculptor and photographer had decided that aliyah was the right move for her and her three children. But a few weeks ago Faerman, 44, changed her mind. She decided to stay in Argentina.

She's not alone. A record 6,325 Argentine Jews made aliyah last year. More than 2,600 did so during the first half of the year.

But this year, only 485 made aliyah during the same period.

The reason, experts say, is the expectation that financial conditions may improve in Argentina, a country that may be emerging from nearly two years of economic free fall.

"In a country of immigrants, many did what their grandparents had done from despair: search for a better land," said Patricio Abramzon, a political scientist who is finishing a master's degree in international migration.

Abramzon also is a consultant to Jewish institutions and co-ordinator of workshops at the local office of the Argentine intelligence services.

"There is an opening and hope that things might improve," he said. "The psychosis is over."

Two months ago, Nestor Kirchner was elected Argentine president in democratic elections, a sign of stability. And official unemployment has fallen to 15.6 per cent, down from 20 per cent a few months ago.

Employment consulting companies say that demand for employees has risen by 30 per cent to 50 per cent.

The realities of day-to-day life are still tough. Nearly 55 per cent of Argentines still live below the poverty line. But there are signs that things may be improving.

There no longer are lines of people who wish to emigrate in front of the Italian and Spanish consulates.

Some of the country's 200,000 Jews, mainly members of the middle class, are reopening their businesses.

The rate of aliyah, though decreasing, in fact is returning to the levels that existed before Argentina's economic crisis.

Until the crisis, approximately 1,000 people moved to Israel from Argentina each year. The only notable exception was during the 1960s, when the activities of an anti-Semitic group known as Tacuara helped push the number to more than 2,000 per year.

Though the numbers are falling as the economic crisis subsides, the Jewish Agency is not giving up, says Lalo Slepoy, who is in charge of aliyah from Latin America for the Jewish Agency.

With its database of potential immigrants growing from recent Israel fairs, the Jewish Agency is making 600 telephone calls to Jewish families each day, inviting them to different Israel-oriented activities: an Israel night, an evening of movie and discussion, a play about a family contemplating aliyah.

In addition, the agency is starting a program in September to provide four months of training in Hebrew language and specialized professional skills. Those who attend will receive a certificate and are expected to emigrate to Israel by the end of the year.

The special benefits Israel is providing to Argentine olim will continue until the end of the year: In addition to plane tickets, language classes and a year of financial subsidies, Argentines will receive home loans and money to ship their belongings to Israel.

Despite the beginnings of renewed optimism in Argentina, the effects of the economic meltdown still are clearly evident.

The number of Jews taking advantage of an integrated social welfare net provided by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee; a local welfare foundation called Tzedaka; the community's central Jewish institution, the AMIA; and other community relief agencies has risen to more than 36,000 from 9,000 in 1999, before the economic collapse.

Beneficiaries receive food tickets, medicine, rent money, scholarships and job training.

According to JDC statistics, more people are entering the system than leaving it. Last May, the social assistance program received 763 new people, while 451 left it.

On a recent visit to Argentina, Sallai Meridor, chairman of the Jewish Agency, said at a news conference that a fall in aliyah also could be linked to the fact that many people hurried to move at the end of 2002, fearing that special benefits would be cut.

One in four N. American immigrants to Israel since 1989 has left

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — One out of every four immigrants from North America who arrived in Israel since 1989 have left Israel for good, according to a Ha'aretz analysis based on Interior Ministry border control statistics regarding immigrants.

Though the statistics are not exact (they do not include people who left on government postings or others who live elsewhere but return every few months), it appears that the highest number of immigrants who leave are from North America: Canada (26 per cent), the United States (23 per cent), followed by South Africa (20 per cent), Britain (19 per cent) and France (16 per cent).

The rate of departing immigrants from South America is only 11 per cent, and among Ethiopians it is close to zero. Only about seven per cent of the 937,777 immigrants from the former Soviet Union who have arrived since 1989 have left the country, according to the statistics.

The high rate of departure among North American immigrants is surprising, as they come here out of choice and identification with the country.

Ian Kaplan, 32, is an immigrant who seems he's here to stay. He came to Israel from Philadelphia nine years ago, completed his army service and is now successfully employed in management of regional environmental projects. But he says, "If I weren't a little crazy, I probably wouldn't hold on here either."

Prof. Charles Liebman of Bar-Ilan University, winner of the Israel Prize for his research of American Jewry, commented, "When I heard about these statistics for the first time I was surprised, but when I thought about it a little more, it seemed logical. Some of the immigrants are very naive. They hear that there are economic problems in Israel but they're sure they'll get over them."

Liebman, who himself immigrated to Israel in 1969, tells about an acquaintance who immigrated to Israel and left twice. "Every time he went back to the United States, he promised to return when he made enough money."

Liebman believes that a smaller number of religious immigrants leave, and a smaller number of those living across the Green Line where, he says, "the social frameworks are very well organized."

"When a person comes to Israel for ideological reasons, his survival ability is greater," says Prof. Moshe Lisk, a sociologist at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"But when a convenient opportunity exists to return to a country of origin where the quality of life is high, sometimes ideological motivation is not a life-long inoculation," he says.

Ian Kaplan agrees. "I tell my friends, 'Forget where you came from. If you expect the service and the standards you knew at home, you'll never make it.'"

BOMBING AFTERMATH: Rescuers survey the scene of a suicide bombing by Fatah's Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade at a shopping centre in Rosh Ha'ayin that killed a 43-year-old man last Tuesday. Another man was killed in a Hamas bombing later that day in the West Bank town of Ariel. They were the first major terror attacks since a June 29 Palestinian truce. [Israel photo]

August 11

• Twenty-six Israeli Druze were released from custody, but police said they will file charges against them after clashes Aug. 10 outside the prime minister's residence. Scores of demonstrators and police were wounded as hundreds protested Israel's plan to unify local Druze authorities.

August 12

• Two Israelis were killed in separate suicide bombings in Rosh Ha'ayin in Israel and the West Bank town of Ariel. Fatah's Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade claimed credit for the Rosh Ha'ayin attack, and Hamas did so for the Ariel attack. In response, Israel temporarily halted the release of 77 Palestinian prisoners. While condemning the attacks, PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas said that they were provoked by West Bank anti-terror raids by Israel, and that he didn't think they violated the Palestinian ceasefire.

• Israel will re-route its security fence, Ma'ariv reported. Without its "eastern finger," which had included Ariel in the West Bank, it will run closer to the Green Line.

August 13

• Israel said it demolished the home near Nablus of the suicide bomber who struck Rosh Ha'ayin the previous day. Israel also said it is freezing prisoner releases and land transfers to the Palestinian Authority.

August 14

• Senior Hamas and Islamic Jihad operatives have resumed planning terror attacks in defiance of the ceasefire, Shin Bet security service sources said.

August 15

• Israel said it would transfer security control to the Palestinians in Jericho and Qalqilyah on Monday and within 10 days in Ramallah and Tulkarm. The deal will be delayed if there is a terror attack or if the Palestinians don't meet security obligations.

Special Report

Community copes with massive power failure

As soon as the power went off Thursday, staff at Sobey's supermarket in Thornhill rushed to save the store's inventory from spoiling.

Workers closed refrigerated display counters and brought refrigerated trucks to store meat and some dairy products. Prices were reduced on meat and ice cream Thursday night, but most of the prepared food had to be thrown out.

An-hour-and-a-half after the power came back on at 5:30 a.m. Friday morning, the store opened as usual, with staff working as quickly as possible to barbecue chickens, make salads and side dishes and freshly baked cakes. Lineups were long, with customers waiting up to an hour.

"You couldn't even get into the parking lot," said Chris Corringham, a food clerk. "The batteries and candles were sold out instantly."

Though business was better than a normal Friday, Corringham said, "you can't consider to imagine the amount of food we lost."

Smaller businesses also lost a great deal. Thursday is normally a very busy day for Hartman's Kosher Meats on north Bathurst Street in Toronto, as staff prepare meat and salads and side dishes for the Shabbat rush.

It was "terrible," owner Joe Hartman said. "I can't believe that in 2003, this can shut down half a continent."

By the time his power came back on early Friday afternoon, Hartman knew he had to get rid of the prepared food and meat in his displays that day because it wouldn't last.

"I gave away all the food," Hartman said Friday. Except for the meat in the freezers, "the store is empty," he said.

Hartman hired trucks to ship meat to food banks and told anyone who came to the store to call their friends and take some home.

Although he lost thousands of dollars, he tried to remained optimistic. He said he was lucky that he was able to ship frozen meat to the caterer for his daughter's wedding Monday.

"As long as I'm healthy, it's OK," he said.

The Hartman wedding wasn't the only simchah affected by the power outage. Rachel Fegelman and Mark Zelunka, who met earlier this year while studying with Aish HaTorah in Israel, didn't plan to have an impromptu barbecue or an a capella choir as part of their wedding last Thursday night, but like many others inconvenienced by the blackout, they found that people made the best of a difficult situation.

In fact, it was "incredible," Zelunka told The CJN on Sunday. "Everybody pulled together."

The newlyweds' outdoor ceremony, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill, began almost on schedule, with some extra time given to the 250 guests to allow them to make their way through the heavy traffic.

By that time, more than two hours after the lights went out, barbecues were already set up outside, and the main course – chicken – was on the grill.

The 26-year-old groom, a rabbinical student, said the celebration was "the most fun you could imagine… it was very beautiful and very inspiring for both of us."

The floral centrepieces "happened to have candles, so the room was just aglow with candlelight," said Zelunka's mother Michelle.

Synagogue members dropped off flashlights and directed traffic, while singer Avichai Zehavi of the Nafshenu Orchestra called members of the Toronto Kol Chaverim Choir, of which he is also a member, for backup, and the band's piano player went home to get an accordion.

Aubie Diamond, a Thornhill-based physician and member of the Toronto Kol Chaverim Choir, was among the dozen or so choir members who showed up to sing. He said he'd "never seen such a lebedik wedding."

Bandleader Yisroel Idels said the volunteers "saw this as a mitzvah." He'd always wondered, he added, "what it was like for klezmer-type bands playing a couple of hundred years ago in Jewish shtetlach, and we actually experienced that… We sort of transported ourselves back to the 1800s. It was just a wonderful wedding. Everyone had a wonderful time. We went around table to table playing."

Among the other Jewish weddings taking place Thursday was that of Debbie Cohen, a teacher at the Downtown Jewish Day School, and Eli Savage, associate director of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Student Life, at Thornhill's Le Parc banquet halls, which had a back-up generator.

Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said almost all the lights were on, and there was no air conditioning, but other than that, everything was normal. "It was very freilach."

Rabbi Charles Grysman, spiritual leader of Zichron Yisroel Congregation in Thornhill, officiated at a funeral on Friday and wrote his eulogy by candlelight, but said on Friday that his synagogue per se had not been affected.

In North York, Jim Heifetz, past president of Beth Tikvah Synagogue's brotherhood, decided to attend minyan on Thursday evening in case they were short of the requisite 10 men. "The davening was outside because there was no light, and the janitor took a flashlight and got some books out."

Rhona Ash, whose daughter married Jonathan Magder at the Royalton Banquet Hall on Thursday evening, said the wedding could not have been more beautiful if they planned the blackout.

The couple was married under a chupah lit by candlelight, she said, and the food was cooked outside on barbecues illuminated by headlights.

"No one panicked, everyone stayed, and guests said they had the time of their lives," said Ash, president of Jewish Women International, Toronto.

Using some generated power, the hall was lit, the band was able to play, and guests partied until at least 11:30, she said.

"Everyone pitched in, and no one got upset. It was truly a miracle," she said.

The blackout did not stop campers at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's Centre Camp in Toronto from carrying on with their planned sleepover, said the centre's Cory Freedman.

"Some campers did go home, but the ones who stayed had a great time," she said.

A representataive of Camp Shalom, a Young Judaea camp located on Lake Muskoka in Gravenhust, Ont., said campers "bunked down early on Thursday" and by Friday afternoon, their power was restored.

First conference held on spousal abuse

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A recent conference on domestic violence in the Jewish community, sponsored by Jewish Women International, closed with three women blowing the shofar.

"That was the wake-up call for Jewish communities to acknowledge that domestic violence is a huge issue, and that it is present in every strata of society," said Penny Krowitz, executive director, JWI Canada, a member of the planning committee, and a speaker at one of the workshops.

Sponsored by JWI

The conference, Pursuing Truth, Justice and Righteousness: A Call to Action, held last month in Baltimore, Md., was the first of its kind. It brought together more than 400 people worldwide – 16 were from Canada and about 26 from Israel – including psychiatrists, social workers, lawyers, rabbis, shelter workers, survivors of abuse, and representatives of social service agencies and Jewish federations.

"The idea was to give people a chance to share information, network and strategize about how to move forward in order to save women's lives," Krowitz said.

Workshop topics included working with youth to change the paradigm, how Jewish law views spousal abuse, the role of the Jewish community in creating a co-ordinated community response and the role of the rabbi in creating a community of safety.

As well, several survivors spoke out "with stories that kept us awake at night. One women said she had to give up her children because they sided with their father," Krowitz said.

In Canada, she said, many organizations have worked on the issue of spousal abuse, but there have been no co-ordinated efforts.

"Our goal is to create a local coalition. We want to bring together rabbis, professionals and other community people – anyone interested in moving forward with an agenda. We can say that we need to change laws, for example, but then we need lawyers at the table.

"We want to provide more education about what constitutes healthy relationships. We should be proactive, not only reactive. Spousal abuse is so pervasive and it is such a huge problem, that we must work in coalition. There is strength in numbers."

Developing a plan of action could involve such simple things as alerting women who work in a mikvah about how to recognize an abused woman. "There is such a gamut of entry points that we need to involve as many people as possible," said Krowitz.

The conference went far beyond what she expected, she said. "I had a great vision when it was being planned, but what I did not anticipate was the energy and the passion. It was palpable in the room.

"There was no hierarchy. Everyone talked to everyone else, and there was a hunger to share information, successes and heartaches.

"It was moving and compelling in terms of the core Jewish value of making the world a safe place. People were so committed to making difference that it became clear that we needed to work together. Listening to even one survivor was enough to say we would do what ever we had to do," Krowitz said.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have been reading a lot in the media about the prevalence of obese children and the lack of good nutrition they receive. I am concerned that my family, like most others, is falling into a pattern of convenience foods due to time constraints. Can you advise me on how to clean the junk out and still offer kid-pleasing foods to my eight-, five- and three-year-olds?

A. I am glad to hear you are commited you to improving your family's eating habits. Childhood obesity is growing at an astounding rate and it is due to poor food choice, excessive portions and lack of physical activity. Here are some suggestions your kids will love.

Fill your cupboards and fridge with some of these foods: yogurt, frozen yogurt, low-fat chocolate milk, light frozen treats such as ice cream sandwiches and fudgsicles, baked nachos and salsa or black bean dips, canned vegetable, minestrone soups or light cup-a-soups, hummus, tzatziki or other yogurt dips, whole grain crackers, pita and flatbread, almonds and walnuts and fresh fruit that the kids will like. You can also make your own cereal snacks by combining several cereals and adding some seasoning, and then storing them in an airtight container. Make sure to buy less sugar cereal and buy instead multi-grain cheerios, raisin bran or corn bran.

Other snacks to have on hand include air-popped popcorn and sliced vegetables, which you can buy ready cut, and then wash and store in a ziplock bag. You can bake low-fat banana bread or low-fat bran muffins (easy to do from a mix). After school, try a piled high bowl of fruit topped with chocolate sauce, light whipped cream, a dollop of frozen yogurt, low-fat sour cream or even sprinkles. You can make a fruit smoothie or milkshake using skim milk, frozen yogurt and fruit. In the fall, try baked apples with a teaspoon of maple syrup or applesauce.

Think outside the box, too. Great nutritious after school snacks can be a turkey sandwich, scrambled eggs and a piece of whole wheat toast, a leftover piece of chicken from last night's dinner or a bowl of cereal and milk.

Most importantly, set a good example. You are their role model. If they see you enjoying these foods, they will accept them more willingly. Get rid of the junk. It is hard to convince your child to eat cantaloupe if the cupboards are full of chips and cookies or if they see others in the house eating them. If you concerned that your child is obese, talk to your child's doctor or a dietitian and begin a new eating program together.

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

After eleven years as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents.

For high school students, Libman helps locate suitable college or university programs, and assists clients through the admissions process. She also helps sharpen up their academic skills in preparation for the faster pace of advanced studies.

For students already in college or university, Libman's expertise helps them consider career options, contemplate graduate schools, or navigate the complexity of professional school admissions. Libman's longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Libman often counsels students who have had learning difficulties or an unexpected academic setback and need help finding their way back to success. As a former university administrator, she knows the ropes and can suggest workable strategies for overcoming institutional barriers.

For students considering US schools, Libman recently participated in the prestigious Harvard Summer Institute on College Admissions.

For more information on Ambitions Educational Consulting, visit www.ambitions.ca or phone 416-780-0288 for an appointment.

The hardest questions in school aren't on the exam.

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

Expert individual educational counselling for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

TODAY'S TEENAGER NEEDS MORE!

By Linda Shapiro

Todays's teenager spends about seven hours a day sitting in school, plus even more hours riding on the bus, doing homework, talking on the phone...Today's teenager needs more.

STIMULATION & MOTIVATION

They need to stimulate their minds with thought provoking issues, socialize with other Jewish teens and have fun. They need to feel good about their accomplishments and themselves.

COMMUNITY INVOLVEMENT

Every teenager has a place in the Jewish Community and the ability to make a valuable contribution. Every teenager must also realize that he or she has a special role in the unfolding of Jewish history. Regardless of background, every teenager can make a difference.

HEALTHY ROLE MODELS

They need to form relationships with role models, two or three years older than themselves. They need to interact with men and women who are grounded, with a realistic perspective on life. All too often, teenagers become manipulated by Hollywood, television and the internet.

CONNECTION & DIRECTION

They need to get connected to their Jewish roots. They need to discover where theycame from so they know where they're going. Far too many teenagers are disillusioned, even cynical, and know nothing about the unique, awesome tradition that is theirs for the taking.

KAPLAN

kaptest.com
Test Prep, Admissions and Guidance. For life.

Heading to a US university?
At Kaplan, we understand how complex the college admissions process can be, especially a test like the SAT. Why write the SAT? First, it is used as a common yardstick against which to measure different students from different schools with different curricula. Secondly, the SAT is used for its predictive value. When evaluated in conjunction with high school grades, the SAT allowed admissions committees at American universities to make a reasonable prediction of how a prospective student will perform academically in their first year.
The SAT is not a perfect test - it certainly favours those who prepare versus those who do not. The SAT lends itself to preparation because it is a predictable test concentrating on a set of specific reasoning skills that can be learned. This kind of bias is evident on all examinations. Better prepared students score higher. The SAT does give colleges a quantifiable measure with which to consider candidates.

An international academic standard at Rivendell Hall

Parents seeking an alternative to public education need a yardstick to assess the standards of private schools. In this difficult decision, the Ontario government offers no help: it sets no pedagogical or curriculum criteria for private elementary schools. The International Baccalaureate Organization (IBO) is the only organization which imposes exacting certification standards, and monitors schools to ensure these standards are upheld.

Around the world, universities acknowledge the IBO Program – offered by schools such as UCC, TFS and York – as an excellent entrance criterion. IBO has designed Primary and Middle Years Programs to prepare elementary and junior high students for the exacting Diploma Program. At all levels, IBO standards meet or exceed those in the 115 countries where IBO's 1,464 schools are accredited. No other educational program has achieved this level of acceptance.

Accreditation requires two to three years to complete. Rivendell Hall International School will be accredited during the 2003-2004 academic year, as an IBO Primary Years Program School. For details, please call the admissions office at 905-780-9633, or visit the IBO and Rivendell Web sites: www.ibo.org and www.rivendellhall.com.

Every Canadian is indebted to Louis Applebaum

New book offers excellent summary of cultural czar's career

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Louis Applebaum, the Toronto-born composer and cultural czar who died three years ago, offers a good illustration of the McLuhanesque observation that culture is invisible and that, as water is to fish, culture is the medium in which we live.

From the '40s through the '80s, Applebaum stood astride our cultural landscape like a colossus. He helped to found the National Film Board, the Stratford Theatre Festival, the Stratford Music Festival and the National Arts Centre. He composed acclaimed soundtrack music for CBC television productions and Hollywood films, and was a foremost influence on the Ontario Arts Council, the Canada Council and other primary arts institutions, especially in his musical realm.

Walter Pitman's recently-published paean to him, the 512-page tome Louis Applebaum: A Passion for Culture (Dundurn, $39.99), is further evidence of Applebaum's importance in shaping our national culture. How many such icons could merit a biography of this size?

Ironically, despite his towering stature within the arts community, Applebaum may not be all that well known to average Canadians. Although generations of theatre-goers at Stratford have heard his fanfare of trumpets at intermission, most of us probably cannot name or recall a theme from any of his compositions. A blurb for the book acknowledges this peculiar fact by describing Applebaum as "the man who was beloved by his fellow artists and the icon to whom every Canadian, knowingly or not, is indebted."

Pitman, a former MP, MPP and director of the Ontario Arts Council, gives us an insightful and painstakingly researched dossier on his subject.

Born in 1918, Applebaum grew up within Toronto's Jewish community, studied with legendary music teacher Boris Berlin, and attended Harbord Collegiate, where he befriended Johnny Wayne, Frank Shuster, Sam Sniderman and other incipient cultural notables. He studied music at the University of Toronto and played piano in revues by Wayne and Shuster, who begged him, "Lou, for God's sake, learn to play on the white keys!"

He also spent a year at Juilliard, an extraordinary leap for an extraordinarily gifted child whose parents had regarded a piano chiefly as "parlour furniture."

Awakening to the possibilities of radio, movies and television and the mass audiences they attracted, Applebaum joined the National Film Board in 1940 and worked with John Grierson, Norman McLaren and other pioneers on more than 100 films, including numerous propaganda pieces against Nazi Germany. In the late 1940s he went to the United States, where he scored many Hollywood films and associated with Aaron Copeland, Igor Stravinsky and other brilliant lights. He returned home in 1949.

Approached by theatre director Tyrone Guthrie in 1953 to write music for two Shakespearean plays for the nascent Stratford Festival, Applebaum was taken aback upon learning that the proposed Elizabethan-style thrust stages would literally squeeze out an orchestra: there was room only for a small ensemble, a physical reality that "had enormous implications for music at Stratford for all time."

Applebaum's dream of a parallel music festival took years to find an audience. He later toured with several acclaimed Stratford productions of Gilbert and Sullivan musicals.

The book devotes equal attention to Applebaum's accomplishments at the CBC and his powerful role as a cultural bureaucrat, pulling the strings in aid of artists and arts education from behind the scenes.

The book presents a thorough portrait of Applebaum's early years and his largely Jewish milieu. Pitman offers the observation early on that Applebaum, like his contemporary John Weinzweig, "never became a 'Jewish composer'" — both artists being essentially unlike Srul Irving Glick, who arose among the next generation of composers and typically let Judaic elements and motifs define his work.

The book offers an excellent summary and analysis of Applebaum's career, with enough details to satisfy historians (and perhaps overwhelm casual readers), along with a few deep glimpses of the man. Applebaum, we learn, "had written music throughout a long career, yet he had never had the luxury of casual composing, with weeks or months to create, revise, and revise again a large work that might become his magnum opus."

He once shocked a colleague who asked if he ever composed spontaneously to express his feelings or ideas. "Why would I do that?" he responded sharply. "Who would pay me to write that piece?"

Louis Applebaum

After reading Louis Applebaum: A Passion for Culture, one wishes its subject had found time to leave us just such a magnum opus as a means of making himself and his legacy less invisible to the average Canadian.

The quintessential Middle Eastern delicacy is the subject of Toronto resident Avner Levona's documentary Falafel.

Falafel as a metaphor for Israel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

They say home is where the heart is. But for many people, thoughts of home are more closely connected to their stomachs.

That is particularly true for Israelis living or travelling abroad. They are known to pine for falafel. This Middle Eastern specialty, a deep fried meatless "meatball" made from ground chick peas or fava beans, is served in pita bread and garnished with vegetables, hot sauce and tahini, a sesame seed-based sauce.

Avner Levona, an Israeli graphic artist and photographer living in Toronto, created a documentary film about this popular street food, aptly titled, Falafel. Released in late spring, Falafel was screened at the 2003 Atlanta, Toronto and Vancouver Jewish film festivals and is scheduled to be shown in the 2003 Miami Jewish Film Festival in December.

The film can be viewed on the Web at www.falafel.ca. The site also has links to other related Web sites for die-hard falafel aficionados.

"Falafel is a metaphor for my nostalgia for Israel," says Levona, explaining that falafel epitomizes what he and other Israeli immigrants miss about their native land.

"Every child in Israel is exposed to falafel and they continue eating it throughout their lives. It's the great equalizer. Rich or poor, everyone in Israel eats falafel."

His childhood memories are filled with images of falafel sold by Yemenite Jews operating out of four-by-four-foot portable steel booths. "They had small gas burners and sold fresh falafel to all the kids. Half a pita was popular during my school days. When I used to go to a movie after school, I got money for juice and a falafel."

Levona prefers Israeli to Canadian-made falafel. "In Israel they give you three falafel balls in a pita and fill it up with salads. Some places have as many as 20. Also popular is the fried potatoes. That's like the cherry on the cake. It's unique to Israel. I really miss that."

What is evident in his film, is that the Israeli culinary experience is seasoned with other flavours that one can't find in Canada – the sounds and smells of home. The scenes of falafel vendors in Tel Aviv evoke those nostalgic images.

And while the culinary offerings and ambience of Israeli falafel shops in Canada may never measure up to their Israeli counterparts, many Israeli immigrants regard these Canadian eateries as homes away from home, according to Levona. "When Israelis eat falafel [in Toronto], they get to talk Hebrew to each other. They talk about politics and anything that bothers them.

"Even if they go alone to a restaurant here, they always find another Israeli to talk to. It's very casual and very comfortable and very much like being back at home."

Falafel reflects Levona's own identity crisis as an immigrant, which he says typifies the experiences of other transplanted Israelis. Initially, he attempted to change his accent and manners. "I tried to blend in, but I eventually realized I am what I am.

"I realized that I liked being Israeli and I wanted to celebrate it. Falafel symbolizes that celebration."

The film is peppered with humourous anecdotes about falafel. Many scenes were shot at a kosher falafel shop in Toronto, where Israelis and Canadians recount their personal experiences with this highly esteemed dish.

One Russian Israeli now living in Toronto tells about her first encounter with falafel shortly after arriving in Israel: Her childhood memories "the half moon of bread and faces dripping with tahini" remain very vivid for her today.

After designing the posters for the Toronto International Film Festival in 2000 and 2001, Levona was inspired to create his own film. "A year ago, my goal was to have a film in the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. I did all the work in my spare time on shoe-string budget."

His best friend, Israeli photographer, Moni Blech, filmed the Israeli scenes. "We always wanted to creating something together," says Levona. "So we collaborated on this project. I sent him a small movie camera and one month later I got the Israeli footage."

He says he was thrilled when the film was accepted. by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. "It's wonderful to be recognized by the community you live in."

Levona will be donating all the money from the film to an Israeli charity and he will also make copies of the film available for fund-raisers for other Israeli causes. He can be contacted at avner@levonadigital.com.

TORONTO YIDDISHIST TO ATTEND OXFORD PARLAY ON YIDDISH AFTER THE HOLOCAUST

Toronto Yiddishist Shirley Kumove leaves this week for a conference at England's Oxford University on Yiddish After the Holocaust, where she is slated to give a presentation titled Catching Arrows: Translating Yiddish Folk Sayings.

Sponsored by Oxford's department of Jewish and Hebraic studies, the gathering is attracting academics, writers, translators and other scholars from across North America, England, Europe and Israel.

Kumove, author of two books on Yiddish folk sayings (Words Like Arrows and More Words Like Arrows), said she will discuss a variety of cultural influences, ranging from television to popular authors, that have nudged Yiddish into the mainstream culture over the last 50 years.

Writers like Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, Philip Roth and Grace Paley "have helped to extend our vocabulary and make certain kinds of phrasing in Yiddish acceptable in English," Kumove said. "For example, a phrase that we take for granted, 'the bottom line,' was originally a Yiddish expression, di untershte shureh."

As far as other projects go, Kumove has been translating some Yiddish poetry, as well as author Yehoshua Perle's 1930 novel Yidn fun a Gants Jor (Ordinary Jews). She recently sent the fully translated manuscript to a publisher.

She plans to attend all four days of Oxford's Yiddish shmuez-fest, which runs Aug. 26 to 29.

What's Doing at Israel's: Lainie Cohen is the author of Crooked Smile: One Family's Journey Towards Healing, a book about her son's car accident and its devastating effect on her family.

Toronto bioethicist Laurie Hardingham has called Crooked Smile "a must-read for everyone faced with a loved one who has a serious injury resulting in disability, and for professionals who work with those families."

Cohen, an educator and psychological consultant, reads from her book at Israel's, 897 Eglinton Ave. W. Refreshments, no admission charge. Wednesday, Aug. 27, 8 p.m. 416-256-1010.

Recent CD of Note: Montreal's high-energy Polish-Jewish-Gypsy-French ensemble Jeszcze Raz has a name that looks hard to pronounce but actually sounds smooth as silk once you get the hang of it (it's pronounced yes-chay-raz).

Also sounding as smooth as silk, the eight-piece band's recent CD Balagne offers a robust blend of influences and the sort of musical charisma that has prompted sales of more than 12,000 copies in Quebec alone.

"Balagne" means bordello in both Hebrew and Polish, two of the four languages used on this eclectic album, which was a contender for a Juno last year.

Apparently Paul Kunigis, Jeszcze Raz's lead musician and vocalist, is happy to oblige journalists asking for interviews in Polish, English, French and Hebrew; at times, he seems to sing Hebrew with a slight Parisian-French accent.

Kunigis has assembled a fine and pleasurable listening experience, albeit one that may be disturbing for some listeners because the Holy Name is pronounced on the title track. The CD is available in record stores.

Rabbi Witty 'flabbergasted' by large response to lecture series

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rabbi Irwin Witty, director of the Latner Jewish Public Library, says he has been "flabbergasted" by the large response the library has received after sending out thousands of flyers promoting Treasures in Jewish Literature, a new literary lecture series scheduled to run from fall to spring.

Alan Ackerman will give the opening talk Oct. 28 on Michael Chabon's Pulitzer prize-winning novel The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay, published in 2000. Ackerman is an associate professor of English at the University of Toronto and an authority on American literature and the 19th-century stage.

Other titles in the series are: A Dybbuk & Other Tales of the Supernatural, adapted from a translation of Shloime Ansky's well-known original published in 1916; Isaac Bashevis Singer's Satan in Goray (1935), a novelistic treatment of the 17th-century messianic movement that centred around Shabbetai Tzvi; Maus I and Maus II (1993), Art Spiegelman's famed graphic novels of the Holocaust; and Dina Rubina's Here Comes the Messiah (2000), a look at Russian emigré life in Israel.

The books were selected by committee for their "meaningful Jewish content," Rabbi Witty said. Five copies of each title will be available for loan from the library beginning in mid-August. The Maus talk, the last in the series, is scheduled for April 27.

Like Ackerman, the other presenters are past and present literary professors: Andrea Most and Anna Shternshis of the University of Toronto, and Elaine Newton, formerly of York University. Rabbi Witty, also formerly of York, will deliver a talk March 16 on Satan in Goray – a book, he said, that "reflects the long tradition in Judaism of awaiting the messiah with bated breath."

Each event includes a review of up to an hour, followed by comments, questions and light refreshments. The series is being presented as a book review club and a series ticket costs $50, with single tickets available for $15 at the door. Sessions take place Tuesday afternoons between 1:30 and 3:30 p.m.

"To the best of my knowledge, this is the first time we've put on such a program," said Rabbi Witty, a former long-time executive director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education. "Mind you, I can only speak for the last 25 or 27 years, whereas the library has been in existence for about 60 years."

He said the book review club is one of several projects the library is initiating to "make a reality of our mandate to be a centre of Jewish knowledge and learning."

To purchase tickets or for further details, call the library at 416-635-2996 or email elaynef@sympatico.ca.

Polish film considered one of the best of all time

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Every once in a while you run across a film that deserves mention even though it may not fit into the category of "Jewish" films. This is the case with The Decalogue, although Episode 8 does deal with a Holocaust survivor trying to understand the motivation and reasoning behind her personal experiences.

It is considered one of the great films of all time and consists of ten individual films that use the Ten Commandments as the inspiration for each of the stories.

The film was originally created for Polish television in the late '80s by Krzysztof Kieslowski, who directed and co-wrote it.

The Decalogue was unavailable for many years. It was released in the United States in 2001 but only for a short time because of a complicated situation regarding distribution rights.

Now the film is receiving a full video and DVD release by Facets Multi-Media in the United States and Morningstar Entertainment in Canada.

On video it comes in a 5-volume VHS set and the DVD version is on 3 discs with some very special extras, including an on-screen preface by Roger Ebert, an extensive interview with director Krzysztof Kieslowski, a visit to the set of The Decalogue and an appreciation of Kieslowski, who died in 1996, by his colleagues and collaborators.

The DVD set also contains a booklet with Kieslowski's own reminiscences, a recent interview with co-screenwriter Krzysztof Piesiewicz and a complete cast and credits list.

The Decalogue is the crowning achievement of Kieslowski's career. He established his reputation with such films as The Double Life of Veronique and Three Colors: Blue, White, Red. But it is this film that secured his reputation as a director and screenwriter.

Each of the episodes of The Decalogue is set in the present and each was shot in the same high-rise apartment building in a middle class section of Warsaw. Although the stories are based on the morals and ethics established by the Ten Commandments, there is no direct reference to the corresponding commandment underlying each story.

Viewers are allowed to reach their own conclusions and ponder the messages behind that story.

Each of the episodes is a complete film on its own. Each one employs a different cinematographer and uses different actors. Each film is a complete morality play that stands on its own merits but all of them together make for a truly monumental achievement.

Examples of the morality aspects include Episode 5, where a young man murders a taxi driver and is arrested, tried and hanged. Kieslowski uses this to question the differences between a murder committed by one man and a state-sanctioned execution.

In Episode 8, a child Holocaust survivor, now living in the United States, returns to Poland to question the woman who refused to hide her during the war. She is interested in learning why someone would agree to shelter a child and then turn her away, knowing that death was almost certain.

The Decalogue created great critical and popular reaction when it was first released in Europe and certainly caused a stir among the few people who saw it in North America.

Now, for the first time, The Decalogue, is available in Canada for everyone to see and enjoy.

The film was produced in Polish and comes with English subtitles.

Pianist's life would make a great movie

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Carmen Or, who defected from the Soviet Union when she was 14, has had a life that could be the subject of a made-for-TV movie.

In fact, the concert pianist says she was once approached about turning her story into a two-part miniseries, but she decided against it because the tale lacked a romantic sub-plot.

"I wanted the story to be true to my life, and with no romance. What kind of story would it make?"

She has since married opera singer Eduardo Del Campo, so "who knows. Now there is some spice to the story."

Now 38 and living in Montreal, Or was in Toronto last spring for a concert sponsored by Toronto Hadassah WIZO. The local group is part of the worldwide WIZO network, "the organization that welcomed me when I defected."

Or was at a musical competition in Switzerland when she fled. "I just decided not to go back [to Russia]. I went to a rabbi in Geneva, and he put me in hiding. I was then put on a plane to Israel and WIZO welcomed me with open arms. They became my surrogate family."

Or, who left her parents and grandmother back in the Soviet Union, says she had been very sheltered at home. "I practised seven hours a day, and was never given a task beyond playing.

Carmen Or

"It was on an impulse that I decided to defect. I didn't ponder the decision, and although I didn't see my mother, [opera singer Eugenia Croltor] for 10 years, I never looked back. My mother, who now lives in Montreal, lost her job at the opera house because of me, and she was refused a visa to go to Israel."

Once Or arrived in Israel, WIZO provided her with shelter and bought her a piano.

"They provided me with all my needs. If I went to a competition, they would find me somewhere to stay. For 10 years they were my only family. Most people had one mother; I had a few. I am testimony of what WIZO is all about. It is important to tell the success story of one of their children.

"I was a kid who came to Israel with no family and no money. WIZO gave me the opportunity to play with orchestra leaders such as Zubin Mehta, Leonard Bernstein,Sir George Solti, Riccardo Muti and Klaus Tennstedt."

She performs for WIZO audiences across Canada because, she says, "I want them to know what their generosity means. They not only saved my life, they made my dream of playing on world stages come true."

When her husband performs, however, "I am a wife. We always travel together and take care of each other. We never work at the same time.

"We decided from the beginning of our marriage [they were married after knowing each other for three weeks] that we would have separate careers."

Concordia U's Norman Ravvin carves out a niche in Canadian Jewish studies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Last September's disturbances at Concordia University, when violence by Palestinian students and their sympathziers prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from fulfilling a speaking engagement, may well have created the impression that Jewish studies has no place on that Montreal campus.

Perish the thought, says Norman Ravvin, chair of Concordia's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies and a professor in its department of religion.

Despite the troubled atmosphere at Concordia, the institute – which supports a wide range of projects of local, national and international interest and offers an eclectic variety of courses and public lectures and seminars – is thriving.

During the past year, the institute, funded by Bronfman family philanthropies, introduced new courses on Jewish literature, the Holocaust and the impact of politics on Canada's Jewish community.

And, he is pleased to report, the institute's second publication, Not Quite Mainstream: Canadian Jewish Short Stories, won Montreal's Segal Prize for Literature.

In partnership with Red Deer Press at the University of Calgary, the institute is publishing a major biography of the late Montreal novelist Mordecai Richler. The author is journalist Joel Yanofsky and Ravvin is the editor.

Plans are also afoot to host a conference on Yiddish next spring, and to publish the Canadian Jewish Studies Reader. Edited by Ravvin and Richard Menkis of the University of British Columbia, the book will include an article on Birobidzhan, the Jewish autonomous republic in the old Soviet Union, by University of Prince Edward Island political scientist Henry Srebrnik.

Ravvin, whose main fields of study are Canadian and American literature and critical theory, taught at the University of New Brunswick from 1997 to 1999 before arriving in Montreal.

Prior to being hired by UNB, where he gave graduate and undergraduate classes in creative writing, he was an instructor and teaching assistant at the University of Toronto.

Ravvin, whose scholarly work has focused on, among other topics, the Holocaust and Yiddish, has steered the institute in certain directions.

He established the publishing program with Red Deer Press, as well as a visiting scholar program that attracts senior and junior professors.

He has also introduced new courses every year so that Canadian Jewish studies can be viewed in different contexts.

And in line with his belief that the institute should maintain bonds with Montreal's Jewish community, he has sponsored public talks on Jewish literary subjects and joined the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and Museum and the National Jewish Archives Committee.

Norman Ravvin

Ravvin, who is married to anthropologist Shelley Butler, began concentrating on Jewish studies after delivering a paper on Eli Mandel at the annual conference of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies, of which he is now president.

The discipline is still attracting new blood, said Ravvin, who turned 40 on Aug. 26. "In a sense, I'm the second generation of cultural workers in the field."

Jewish studies in Canada, he said, was pioneered by scholars such as Ira Robinson, Hesh Troper, Frank Bialystok, Irving Abella and Mesh Butovsky.

In carving out his own niche, Ravvin has written essays on Holocaust literature, postwar Canadian and American fiction, ethics, religion and Yiddish.

"All of these topics are somehow related in my mind," he explained. "Ethics, in particular the work of Emmanuel Levinas, provides a context for thinking about the Holocaust. And we consider Yiddish as part of the heritage largely lost during the Holocaust."

In addition, Ravvin has published monographs on such writers as Bruno Schulz, Edgar Allan Poe and Leonard Cohen.

"They have inspired me both as a writer and as an explorer in literary culture," observed Ravvin. "Schulz for his exoticism and fancy, Poe for his wildness and doomed life, Cohen for having marked out a unique spot for a Canadian Jewish imagination in the local mainstream."

In 1997, McGill-Queen's University Press published Ravvin's book, A House of Cards: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory, in which he analyzed a parade of North American writers, from Chava Rosenfarb and Philip Roth to Saul Bellow and Mordecai Richler.

A member of the editorial board of Parchment, the Canadian Jewish literary review, Ravvin believes Richler has a secure place in the pantheon of Canadian literature.

"Clearly, he has become a popular icon, and will remain an important Canadian literary figure. His books have not influenced me as a writer, but his presence on the scene and the particularity of his views are hard to avoid."

Born in Calgary, the son of Albert and Nan Ravvin, he has written two novels, Cafe des Westens and Lola By Night, which will be published in October.

"My first novel was an attempt to mine Jewishness in Calgary with a heavy overlay of memory of the Polish past of one family. It was a risk-taking book, full of attention to light and sound and smell. You only write one like that."

Lola by Night, which is set in Vancouver and Manhattan, turns on a Spanish woman who stumbles upon secret facets of her father's life after his death. "She becomes someone new in the process of recovering what's past."

A man of many interests, Ravvin is also currently writing an essay on Theolonious Monk, the legendary pianist and composer from the "cool" school of jazz.

"Monk's the man, the real thing. He lived for his art and left a singular oeuvre. He's a kind of counter figure to everything generic."

Gilbert's wisdom helps Roddick win Montreal tennis title

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL — Nine years ago, tennis coach Brad Gilbert guided Andre Agassi from a number 30 ranking to number 1 in 12 months.

Agassi's quest, which included six Grand Slam titles (including the Australian Open, the French Open, the U.S. Open and Wimbledon) over his eight-year coaching relationship with Gilbert, began when Agassi won the Canadian Open title in 1994.

This year, Gilbert again guided his student to the Canadian Open championship, now called the Tennis Masters Series Montreal title,which was held recently at Jarry Park Tennis Stadium.

Gilbert's student is now 20-year-old American Andy Roddick, ranked fourth in the world. Gilbert's ability to transform Agassi from a promising star to the most dominant player in the game makes many believe he could do the same with Roddick.

"It is entirely possible that Roddick can become a number 1 player with Gilbert coaching him," said former Canadian Davis Cup captain Peter Burwash, who commented on the matches for CBC-TV.

"Brad is a master at scouting opponents and analyzing the weakness of their games. Gilbert will take Roddick's gift of an explosive serve and turn him into a more strategic player. Gilbert has long been acknowledged as having one of the best tennis minds and as a great coach."

Gilbert started working with Roddick following the French Open in June, when Roddick lost his first-round match. In the past three three months, Roddick has won two titles with a 24-

Brad Gilbert

2 record, with Gilbert as coach.

"I sought Brad out and it was the best decision I have ever made in my life. He has helped me think for myself and recognize the importance of the mental game," Roddick said after winning the Montreal title.

"I wanted to work with a player at the beginning of his career who can win Grand Slam titles. Andy is a great talent and I felt that he was ready to take the next step to improve his ranking," Gilbert said.

"Andy is committed to learning and pushing himself. I tell him little things, such as 'Concentrate on every point and don't give your serve up. Play every point with a sense of urgency. Never celebrate winning a point. Celebrate only when the tournament is over,'" Gilbert added.

Roddick's most challenging match in Montreal took place in the semi-final round when he defeated current Wimbledon champion Roger Federer 6-4, 3-6, 7-6 (3) in three dramatic sets. Up to that point, Roddick had not defeated Federer in four meetings.

"I was more prepared for Federer because I had Brad coaching me," said Roddick. "I definitely have turned a corner working with him, and it's translating into victories."

Gilbert made his tennis theories public in his bestselling book Winning Ugly (1995). The 42-year-old Californian played on the men's pro tennis circuit from 1982-95 and was ranked fourth in the world in 1989.

Gilbert was never blessed with a powerful serve, volley or backhand. He earned his high ranking and 20 tournament titles by strategically placing shots to his opponent's weakness. For example, Gilbert's net shots neutralized Boris Becker's powerful serve in defeating the former great German tennis player three times.

Gilbert made history during his days as a player. He is part of the historical 1990 U.S. Davis Cup winning team that, for the first time ever, had three Jewish players on a cup-winning team.

Gilbert and his family have been strong supporters of Jewish philanthropies throughout his life. Gilbert's 20 titles include two titles in Tel Aviv. Locally, Gilbert has appeared at multiple functions for Maccabi Canada, giving tennis clinics at the Cote St. Luc Tennis Club and the Snowdon YM-YWHA whenever he competed in Montreal.

Before embarking on his pro career, Gilbert earned a silver medal for finishing as a finalist in the 1981 Maccabi Games in Israel. His sister Dana won the gold medal for winning the 1978 Maccabi Games before embarking on a four-year stint on the women's pro circuit. His brother Barry still competes at the Maccabi Games, as part of the men's senior tennis team.

After Gilbert's success in helping Agassi become a champion, the expectations on Roddick will be high, especially now that he has won in Montreal.

Gilbert is married to Kim and has three children, Zack, Julian and Zoe. Their home is in San Rafael, Calif.

Football MVP tries hand at rugby

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Evan Shapiro was so keen on playing high school football last year that he accepted a scholarship to suit up for a Catholic school. But he didn't fit in as the lone Jew at De La Salle College and has yet to compete in a game at the high school level.

The Richmond Hill resident, who recently turned 16, transferred to Thornhill's Westmount Collegiate two weeks into the year to be with his friends, but he suddenly found himself without a football team to play for. He is considering changing schools again in the fall, to attend Markham District High School so he can get back on the gridiron.

A 5-11, 170-pound running back, Shapiro is a two-time MVP for the Markham Raiders of the Central Ontario Minor Football League, and he was twice named the club's defensive player of the year while plugging a hole at the linebacker position.

The multi-talented athlete says it was a challenge playing on both sides of the ball.

"It was tiring, but a lot of fun," said Shapiro, whose father Garry won a provincial championship playing high school football in Quebec.

Without football on his slate, Shapiro decided to take up rugby this past year and said it gave him the same kind of feeling. He led the team in tries, anchored scrums and played a big role in helping Westmount capture the York Region Tier Two title.

Shapiro was also Westmount's junior basketball team captain and its MVP, averaging 20 points a game in the four contests he played. Despite missing half the season with an ankle injury, he was still voted a league all-star.

"I stood out in the games I played, and they were the only four the team won," he said. "[The York Region] coaches [who voted] recognized that."

With rugby season conflicting with track, he was unable to participate in yet a third sport for his school.

Shapiro was a track and field star at the August 2001 Junior Maccabi Games in Philadelphia, winning eight gold medals and one bronze. When organizers cut track out of this summer's eight-country competition, he elected to attend Camp Tamarack in Muskoka instead.

Shapiro left in early July for his final year as a camper, intent on keeping himself in shape should he opt to change schools and play football in the fall.

"I'll do what I can," he said before leaving, admitting he hadn't put too much thought into making another transition.

"I'll go to the weight room with a friend who also plays football and go for runs around the camp."

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

לצחוק קצת...

אקסטרה סמול מאת: ליעד שהם

ויתי בימי ההזדונה... ניסיתי לרכוש את ספרו העכשווי של ליעד שהם. קראתי את בקורת הספרים ושמעתי שכדאי. בשלוש חנויות ספרים בירושלים אזל המלאי. עשיתי הזמנה ואכן באתי אל סיפוקי. אקסטרה סמול איננו ספר "גדול"; זו לא ספרות טובה של ממש אבל הספר מעורר צחוק (מהבטן) ונוגע באמיתות קלילות שמדברות אל כל אחד מאתנו.

"אני זוכר במפורש" כך נפתח הספר, "שרשמתי בטופס, שהיוולד ניו זילנדי זה אצלי בעדיפות הראשונה. למה? שואל קצין המיון רשם הבחור ניו זילנד! חרי תמות שם משעמום. זה בדיוק מה שאני רוצה, השבתי לו, להעביר את החיים בתור ג'ינג'יק, ולראות ירוק וכבשים כל הזמן." וכך נמשך הדיון בין הכותב לקצין המיון; אם אי-אפשר ניו זילנד אז אולי צרפת, או אנגליה ואולי אמריקה? נו, ומה בכל זאת לגבי ישראל? "זו אמנם מדינה אקסטרה סמול, אבל אל תתבלבל מגודלה הפיזי" מסביר הקצין, "לאנשים שיושבים בה אין שום רגשי נחיתות. אם כבר, אז להיפך. הם חושבים שהם אימפריה, עם נבחר... כדאי לך. לא יהיה לך שם רגע אחד משעמם. ישראל זו יחידה קרבית ממש." וזהו. ישראל היא המדינה.

"זקנים כאן קודקוד" הוא קטע מצויין, ספק טראגי, ספק קומי המספר על גיוס יחידת מילואים. במכתב שנפתח במילים: "חייל מילואים יקר" מצווה הנמען להתייצב לא יאוחר מאשר תוך שלוש שעות מרגע קבלת הצו, במקום שהוא במרכז הארץ. התרגיל גובל באבסורד; "אתם תעלו עכשיו לאוטובוס, שיסיע אתכם למטווח שנמצא איזה חצי שעה נסיעה מכאן, ושם תירו בנשק שלושה כדורים. בסוף המטווח תחזרו לכאן, ונשחרר אתכם." הצעת הייעול של המחבר שבמקום לגרור מכשיר-קשר מסורבל, עם אנטנה בגובה של מטר וחצי ישתמשו בפלאפון מתקבלת בתרעומת שכן צבא זה צבא!

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

What are the ethical obligations when selling one's home?

Jewish law rejects the notion of caveat emptor (buyer beware) and places an onus of disclosure on the seller of merchandise. The seller of a home – or any other object, for that matter – must reveal any "hidden" defects of the object, even those of a non-material nature. These would include an inefficient furnace, holes in the floor under the carpet, a roof that would likely need replacing soon or even that the house creaks. If the lack of disclosure is of such a magnitude that a reasonable buyer would have walked away from the deal – for example, the home contains asbestos – the buyer can render even a closed deal null and void. Of course, the vendor must ensure the home is in at least as good condition on the day of the closing as on the day the offer was accepted.

The seller cannot shirk his responsibility of disclosure by simply advising the buyer to have an inspection done. But a prudent home-buyer should still have an inspection done, because, except for those extremely serious and rare non-disclosures, the buyer has no recourse if the vendor lacks ethics. The buyer is expected to have a basic understanding of the marketplace and to perform some degree of due diligence. Obvious deficiencies in a home need not be pointed out as it is the buyer's responsibility to notice them. These might include lack of proper lighting or air-conditioning or holes in the ceiling.

While Jewish law regulates the amount of profit one can make in the necessity sector (for example, food, rent), no such provision exists in the real estate market. Thus, auctioning one's home to the highest bidder would present no moral issue. However, our Sages have ordained that one must first offer one's neighbour the right of first refusal on a home. This ordinance – applicable only when the buyer pays fair market value – prohibits one from taking advantage of the natural desire of someone to expand his property and thus charge them a price higher than the norm.

Forensic experts sift through the carnage from the bus bombing in Jerusalem last week, trying to find ways to identify the victims. Twenty-one people were killed, six of them children, and more than 100 injured by a Hamas terrorist. In response to the attack, the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) moved tanks toward Ramallah and Nablus. On Thursday, the IDF killed Hamas leader Ismail Abu Shanab in Gaza and on Sunday, they eliminated senior Hamas leader Ahmed Shatiwi. Please see related stories on page 29. [Isranet photo]

British arrest Iranian wanted for 1994 AMIA bombing in Argentina

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — A former Iranian ambassador to Argentina, wanted there in connection with the 1994 bombing of a Buenos Aires Jewish community centre in which 85 people were killed, was arrested last Thursday in England.

Police in Durham, northeast England, arrested Hadi Soleimanpour, 47, at his home there on an extradition warrant, police sources said.

Soleimanpour was to appear at Bow Street Magistrates' Court in London last Friday, Metropolitan Police headquarters in London said.

Police said the warrant issued Thursday at Bow Street alleges that "on or before" July 18, 1994, Soleimanpour conspired with others to murder people at the Asociación Mutual Israelita de la Argentina, the Jewish Community Center AMIA and Delegation of Argentine Jewish Associations building.

The Iranian government has several times denied any responsibility in the AMIA attack, in which a car bomb killed 85 and wounded more than 200.

Argentine federal judge Juan Jose Galeano, who is investigating the attack, had requested the arrest of Soleimanpour, who was Iranian ambassador to Argentina at the time of the explosion.

Soleimanpour has been in the United Kingdom since February 2002 on a student visa and was studying at Durham University, police sources said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Day of Unity

VANCOUVER — The Ohel Ya'akov Community Kollel of Greater Vancouver is presenting its third annual "Day of Unity" on Sept. 1, Labour Day, from noon to 4 p.m. in the Fraser River Park in South Vancouver. Backed by almost 30 other local Jewish groups representing a cross-section of the community, it will include a kosher barbecue, as well as rides and other entertainment.

Israel

Temple Mount Visits

JERUSALEM — The Temple Mount was opened to non-Muslim visitors last week, and several hundred Christian and Jewish visitors toured Judaism's holiest site. The move to open the site, which has been closed to non-Muslims since the latest intifadah began in September 2000, was made without the approval of the Waqf, the Islamic trust responsible for the site.

Jets Buzz Bashar

JERUSALEM — Israeli fighter jets buzzed the palace of Syrian President Bashar Assad, Israeli television reported Aug 15. The flyover followed recent shelling of northern Israel by Hezbollah in Lebanon and was intended to warn Assad to rein in the guerillas, the report said.

World

Lebanon Tries Canadian

BEIRUT — A Canadian missionary charged with spying for Israel has told a military tribunal his visits to Lebanon were part of a project to replant its biblical cedar forest, judicial sources said last week. Bruce Balfour, 52, has been in jail since his arrest at Beirut's airport July 10 on what the sources said were charges of working with Israel to spy on Hezbollah guerrillas and the Lebanese army. Balfour and another Canadian were charged in absentia earlier this year. Balfour was detained when he tried to re-enter Lebanon.

Death Sentence

RABAT — Morocco has sentenced four men to death for their role in May suicide bombings that targeted several Jewish sites. The men were convicted last week of plotting to be among the 12 suicide bombers in the attacks, which killed 32 bystanders. No Jews died in the attacks, which targeted five sites, four of them connected to Jews.

Iran Warns Israel

TEHRAN — Iran is warning Israel not to attack its nuclear facilities. "The Zionist regime proved to be adventurous in the past and doesn't abide by any principles," an Iranian spokesperson said in Tehran last week, in an apparent reference to Israel's 1981 attack on an Iraqi nuclear facility. Israel has increased its pressure on the European Union and the United States to stop Iran's nuclear weapons program after Iran recently tested a missile capable of hitting Israel.

Think Tank Closed

NEW YORK — Jewish groups are welcoming reports that an Arab think tank known for promoting anti-Semitism has been closed. The Anti-Defamation League and the Simon Wiesenthal Center are praising the United Arab Emirates for closing the Zayed Center, which has provided a platform for anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial. It also hosted lectures by western heads of state and diplomats and recently gave a controversial grant to Harvard University's divinity school.

Blackout Vandalism

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — The University of Michigan's Hillel building was defaced with a swastika and obscenities during the recent blackout. Police believe vandals took advantage of the Aug. 14 blackout to paint the graffiti, Hillel director Michael Brooks said. Police officials consider the episode as an isolated incident.

Cemetery Desecrated

BERLIN — A Jewish cemetery in central Germany has suffered major vandalism. Workers arriving last Monday found 56 gravestones overturned in the cemetery at Kassel, which has stones dating back to the 16th century. A police spokesperson said the vandalism was the worst he had ever seen and must have been committed by several perpetrators, likely over the weekend.

Alter The Passion: SWC

LOS ANGELES — Rabbi Marvin Hier, head of the Simon Wiesnthal Center, last week wrote actor and director Mel Gibson asking him to make changes to his yet-to-be-released film The Passion. It depicts the last 12 hours of Jesus's life and Jewish leaders have said it wrongly reinforces stereotypes that Jews were responsible for his death. The centre said its endorsement of changes to the film "has generated an unprecedented wave of hate mail and calls."

Ahenakew Offered Ticket to Auschwitz

EDMONTON — A Holocaust survivor has offered ex-national native leader David Ahenakew a one-way ticket to Auschwitz, saying he rejects his apology for saying if it hadn't been for Adolf Hitler, the world would be owned by Jews.

Edmonton businessman Issy Burstyn, 73, made the offer last week after reports Ahenakew made new comments to a Toronto magazine that one race controls the media.

"When a group of people, a race of people, can control the world media, then there's got to be something done about that," Ahenakew said in an interview published recently in This Magazine. He didn't specify which race he was referring to.

"I want him to see Auschwitz for himself," Burstyn told the Edmonton Sun. "Maybe he will realize that if he was in Poland in 1942, he would have been 'fried' there, too."

The Sun could not reach Ahenakew for comment.

Last December, Ahenakew, 68, told a Saskatoon reporter that Hitler was trying to "clean up the world" when he "fried" six million Jews in the Holocaust, and that the world would be owned by Jews if not for Hitler. He later apologized.

In June, he was charged with inciting hatred against an identifiable group.

"I don't think he will go," Burstyn said. "Maybe if he did go he would understand what it is like to have your entire family destroyed, as happened to me."

The one-way ticket would cost about $900.

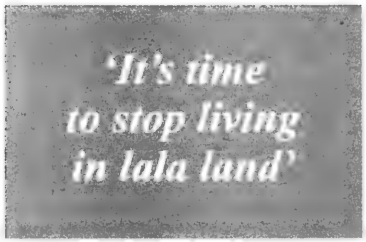
Hoenlein delivers sobering message at campaign launch



By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"There can be no compromise with terrorism. It's a cancer that has to be rooted out in its entirety, or it comes back and does greater damage," said an impassioned Malcolm Hoenlein at the community launch of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Campaign 2004 last Thursday at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

The New York-based executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish organizations, a noted Middle East commentator, scrapped his planned remarks on "The Rocky Road Map to Peace" to focus on the events of the previous day, when 20 people – including six children under the age of 7 and a mother who had recently volunteered to donate a kidney – were killed by a suicide bomber on a Jerusalem bus leaving the Kotel.

"What crime did these people commit?" Hoenlein asked. "The terrorists want us to think we did something wrong."

Only last month, Hoenlein said, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat said that praying in Jerusalem constitutes Zionist aggression. Arafat's contention that Jews have no historical ties to Israel is an affront to Judaism and Christianity, he added.

Arafat gave the green light for the terrorist attacks, said Hoenlein, who called last week's bombing "a watershed event" and said our lives and priorities have to be different as a result.

"Israel's war is our war," he said, "because it's a war for the same values – for democracy, for freedom and for liberty."

No one is safe, he warned. Islamic fundamentalism – not Islam per se, he noted – "represents a world-wide danger."

For those who try to understand the motivations of suicide bombers, Hoenlein asked, "Did we ask the Nazis what crime was done to them? Did we ask fascists what crimes were done to them? At the core of Islamist ideology is Nazism."

It's time to go after states such as Syria that make terrorist attacks possible and to "remove the restraints on Israel," so it has the right to defend itself like every country in the world, said Hoenlein, referring to such measures as targeted killings and the building of a security fence.

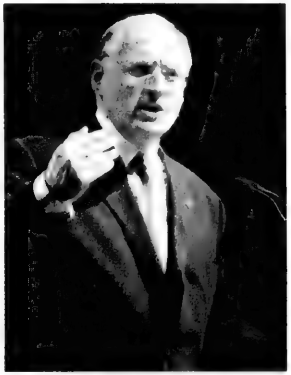
Since the hudna [truce] was reached between Palestinian terror groups, the IDF has prevented almost 300 attacks, he noted, yet three PA ministers recently said they would not confiscate arms.

"There has to be new leadership," said Hoenlein, adding that Arafat – not PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas – is still in charge.

"It's time to stop living in lala land," Hoenlein said. "It's time to stop making concessions. It's time to say to Abbas, 'Put up, or get out.'"

Hoenlein urged the audience of more than 1,000 people to make the world a better and safer place for future generations by reaching out to young people affected by anti-Semitism on campus, as well as by visiting Israel, buying Israeli products and writing letters.

"You have the ability to change things if you want it," he said.



Malcolm Hoenlein

This year's campaign is an extension of last year's Israel Emergency Campaign, which raised a record $65 million, said Allan Silber, who is co-chairing Campaign 2004 with Richard Venn.

The campaign raises funds for Israel, overseas and locally. It assists, among others, Israelis injured in terror attacks and those affected by unemployment and poverty, as well as students affected on campus by what Hoenlein called "the most blatant anti-Semitism since the 1940s."

Almost $20 million has been raised already, said Venn.

The launch, chaired by Michael Diamond and Wendy Posluns, also included the Toronto debut of the Israeli musical group Yachad.

End-of-summer thoughts

As August falls away from the 2003 calendar, here are some thoughts to thin the sound of the page slipping sibilantly into history.

* * *

Earlier this month, the Palestinian Authority (PA) complained it would not be able to engender sufficient popular support for its commitments under the road map peace plan unless Israel stopped and reversed its work on the security fence. That the security fence was nowhere mentioned in the road map agreement was overlooked by most international media – including Canadian – as they predictably picked up and parroted the Palestinian complaint.

From the editor's desk

That the PA did say it would not even attempt to dismantle the terror network, which was the first and pre-eminent commitment upon the PA mentioned in the road map, was also overlooked by most international media, including Canadian.

Because media coverage steered the spotlight away from the road map and toward the security fence, a great deal of advice for the government of Israel about that fence appeared in all the local newspapers.

One particularly brief letter to the editor to the Globe and Mail, which was published on Aug. 9, is a paradigm of the propaganda and distorted history that is constantly used to blame Israel.

"Your editorial states that 'Israelis have an absolute right to be free of terror.' Perhaps it could be helpful to add that Palestinians have an absolute right not to be expelled from their homes in Israel for more than 50 years because of their race, or not to be illegally occupied in the West Bank for more than 35 years."

In just 38 words, the letter-writer repeats three wholly incorrect statements and in the process, stains Israel with an especially loathsome epithet.

• The truth must be repeated over and over and heard at least as often as the lie. Some Palestinians were expelled during the war in 1947-8, but most were not. The vast majority of Palestinians who were displaced left their homes of their own volition or at the urging of their own leaders, or in circumstances that characterize all situations of war, namely chaos, fear and survival.

• The use of the term "race" is factually, historically, anthropologically and morally inappropriate. Its only purpose is to create the odious allusion of Israel as a racist state.

• Even if, for argument's sake, one accedes to the use of the term "occupation" in reference to Israel's presence in the West Bank, it cannot correctly be called "illegal." Israel's presence in the West Bank after 1967 arose by virtue of a defensive war it fought to save its life. Prior to that war, the territory was claimed and ruled by Jordan, not by any Palestinian national movement or by a Palestinian leadership. Nor did the Jordanian government rule the territory in trust for any Palestinian national movement. Three times Israel has publicly pleaded to negotiate a return of territories it captured during that war, but each time the Palestinian leadership rejected its plea:

1. The infamous three noes of the Arab world in Khartoum after the Six Day War in 1967;

2. The refusal to allow then-Egyptian president Anwar Sadat to negotiate autonomy at Camp David with then-Israeli prime minister Menahem Begin and then-U.S. president Jimmy Carter;

3. The refusal by PA President Yasser Arafat at Camp David and at Taba to reach an agreement brokered by then-U.S. president Bill Clinton with then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak.

Every Israeli government, at least since 1993, has expressly said it wished to end the "occupation" in the West Bank. A majority of Israelis want their government to do so. But the truth is, the Palestinian leadership refuses to negotiate the end of the "occupation" of the West Bank because it will mean giving up their claims to the rest of the territory they consider to be occupied: all of Israel.

It was hard not to notice last week that the Canadian government did not issue a formal statement condemning the Jerusalem bus bombing. The omission was particularly egregious in light of the fact that it issued a formal statement condemning the heinous bombing of UN headquarters earlier that same day in Baghdad.

When asked by The CJN about the omission, Foreign Ministry spokesperson Isabelle Savard said the minister had been informed of the Baghdad bombing early in the morning and had all day to prepare a press release. But "there was no press release about Jerusalem because the minister and the prime minister strongly condemned it in a scrum when they arrived in North Bay for caucus [meetings]."

There is simply no comparison in either the symbolic and substantive policy weight or in the extent of distribution of a statement issued orally during a press scrum or one issued formally as part of a ministry's policy apparatus.

What implicit message is sent to the terrorists and their supporters by our government's different treatment of two equally brutal terrorist acts?

CLARIFICATION

The CJN may have inadvertently misled its readers with the wording of the caption under the photo that accompanied the essay on the Perspectives page last week. We asked Jews for Judaism to provide a photo that illustrated a typical street confrontation with Jews for Jesus proselytizers. They provided a photo for educational purposes of a re-enactment of such a confrontation. Our caption incorrectly suggested an actual confrontation. MBD

Otzma recruits doctors for emergency service in Israel

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

Steve Friedman outside Tel Hashomer hospital in Tel Aviv

As the threat of war in Iraq loomed, Steve Friedman confirmed his plans to go to Israel as more than just a tourist.

He was heading there to volunteer as an emergency-room doctor at Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv, and the threat of another Gulf War only deepened his resolve.

Despite the ominous warnings of missile attacks from Iraq, nothing happened in the 10 days he spent at Tel Hashomer. It was quieter than the emergency room at Toronto General Hospital, where he works.

"It was business as usual," he says. "The biggest threat was crossing the street."

Friedman's volunteer stint was more than just a one-time, one-man deal. He is part of a new program called OTZMA Volunteers for Life, which recruits foreign doctors and integrates them into the Israeli medical system. In a time of need, these volunteers will be brought in to replace Israeli doctors who are called up for army duty and to lessen the workload for doctors remaining in the hospitals.

The program has already attracted 225 doctors, but would like at least 2,000. In order to be prepared, OTZMA doctors are expected to volunteer in their Israeli hospitals once a year.

Malka Shostack, OTZMA logistics co-ordinator, says that in the event of catastrophe, a call will go out to the volunteer doctors. Within 48 to 72 hours, surgeons, anesthesiologists and emergency doctors such as Friedman will board a specially chartered El Al flight and be whisked off to Israel to take their places in Israeli hospitals and treat casualties.

"In the first three to four days, the need is very specific, but later on, every specialty will be needed," says Shostack.

Before going to Israel, Friedman, a graduate of Montreal's Herzliah High School, tried to learn the Hebrew words for various body parts, symptoms and medical tests.

"It's not like going to Herzliyah and learning about Shmuel Aleph and Shmuel Bet. Shmuel Bet never went to the emerg with a heart attack and needed a lachatz dam (blood pressure) taken," says Friedman, who was the first OTZMA doctor to get an Israeli medical licence.

The program stresses building relationships with the hospitals so that foreign doctors can be trusted in a crisis. The Tel Hashomer emergency department director once left Friedman to run the department on his own – something that wouldn't have happened if the director didn't trust him, he says.

"You're not going to be some guy walking in out of the blue into any situation."

The highlight of his stay, Friedman says, was forming professional relationships with the Israeli doctors.

"It's rewarding because you're actively involved in Israel beyond reading Ha'aretz online and contributing to community actions," says Friedman. "You're actually treating patients. My signature is on the charts."

As a souvenir, Friedman brought back one of the unused gas mask and vials of nerve gas antidote that are distributed to every Israeli.

Toronto cardiologist Eric Gangbar also joined the OTZMA program. If a crisis occurs, he will be among the second group of doctors that flies to Israel, where he will head to Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital for duty in its cardiology department.

The biggest hurdle, says Gangbar, who recently returned from the OTZMA orientation week in Israel, will be to adapt to the Israeli medical system. And although English is widely spoken in hospitals, Gangbar says he wants to brush up on his Hebrew.

Shostack hopes OTZMA will never need to call on its volunteers. "Hopefully we'll never need that, but you need to be prepared."

Working at Koffler part of Brinder's family history

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Marni Brinder, the cultural programming and fundraising co-ordinator for the Koffler Centre of the Arts, may have started her job less than a year ago, but she feels as if she's been there all her life.

"Actually, I have been around here ever since I can remember. My grandmother, Rose Brinder, was head of the Koffler School of Visual Arts, and she would often take me to work when my mother was working.

Spotlight

"As well, I went to the nursery school, I worked at Centre Camp for 10 years, and my two brothers worked at Centre Camp this summer. There has been a Brinder here for at least 25 years. It's a family enterprise," says Brinder who has a master's degree in English literature from McGill University.

"Let's just say that this is a fairly new job, but the surroundings are definitely familiar. When I was interviewed for this position by [Koffler Centre director] Diane Uslaner, we both felt like it was meant to be," she says.

Brinder spent much of her first several months on the job, planning Koffler's second annual fundraising gala, Stars of the 21st Century, which took place last spring at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

"Among other things, I put together a corporate fundraising package, co-ordinated various committees and the volunteers, and sent out literature. Working on that project quickly immersed me in the job," she says.

"Dancers from the Bolshoi Ballet, National Ballet of Cuba, the Munich Ballet, Alvin Ailey American Dance Theatre and Canadian Ballet Theatre took part in the show.

Marni Brinder

"Having such names added prestige to our name, and also helped bring culture to the community. Some people volunteered just to be part of the event," says Brinder.

As the cultural arm of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the Koffler Centre is comprised of the schools of visual arts, music and dance, the drama department, as well as the annual book fair and book awards.

"Part of our mandate is to enhance the Jewish content of Koffler, and to that end we've begun a mezuzah project, which involves affixing mezuzot to every door in the centre.

"I'm contacting artists and asking them to create mezuzot out of various media such as wood, glass, plaster or clay. The project truly reflects our mandate, because it is a blend of art and Judaism."

It was "bashert," she says, that this job was open just when she graduated. "I feel as if it was something that I was working towards. To walk into a new job and feel like a colleague right away is a great feeling."

Organizations implement post-blackout measures

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN and FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporters

Sandy Keshen, executive director of the Reena Foundation, said that just over two years ago, when people across the world were concerned about a possible Y2K crisis, Reena spent a great deal of time and effort to put emergency procedures into place.

It paid off on Aug. 14 when the lights went out.

"Thanks to that initiative, staff across our system were well prepared to deal with the loss of hydro and coped splendidly. Managers contacted all supervisors, who in turn contacted all front-line staff currently on a shift and those who were expected to take over," Keshen said.

"In spite of their obvious concerns about their own family members and difficulties getting to or from the group homes, no location was unattended for even a brief period."

Sol Fleising, Reena's director of finance, said that a children's home located in Maple is located above an artesian well and is kept dry year-round by two sump pumps.

"We learned an important lesson [the day of the blackout] – sump pumps need more than love and affection to keep running," Fleising said. "After about four hours without power, the water started to back up into the basement and by 4 a.m. was about five inches high.

The Vaughan Fire Department pumped out most of the water, and Reena staff pumped the rest and mopped the floors, while "our client Josh [stayed] up well past his bedtime, calm and cool as a cucumber," he said.

A letter from Baycrest Terrace, signed by its resident council, thanked staff and volunteers for the "wonderful care, help and treatment. [They] did their utmost to ensure our safety and well-being during the blackout."

Staff arranged for some residents to sleep on the main floor, the letter said, and they helped others get upstairs to their apartments.

Staff and volunteers also ensured that residents had nourishing meals delivered to all 11 floors, and gave residents advice as to how to keep comfortable. "[Everything] was done calmly, efficiently and in good spirits."

Old Y2K plans and conservation measures help them cope

Ve'ahavta, the Jewish humanitarian organization, had a team of 43 people volunteering in the rainforests of Guyana, South America. Guyana is one of the poorest places in the Western Hemisphere and frequently has no electricity and/or plumbing, said Avrum Rosensweig, the organization's director.

When he reached Ve'ahavta leaders in Guyana and learned they had full electricity and plumbing, his response was, "We have neither."

In the aftermath of the blackout, when Ontarians were being asked to conserve power, Jewish organizations contacted by The CJN said they were minimizing their use of air conditioning and electric lights.

Wendy Lampert, one of more than 100 employees at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who works at the Lipa Green Building, said last week she didn't know how much the temperature had been lowered in the building, but said she was wearing summer dresses that she "would be freezing in on a normal day. The building is much warmer than usual."

Sheldon Maerov, executive director of Beth Tzedec Congregation – the largest Conservative congregation in North America with 2,800 member families – said last week that, to conserve energy, window blinds were closed wherever possible, lights had been turned off, the grass hadn't been watered, and air conditioning was being turned on only in rooms that were in use and only just before they were needed.

"We try to conserve here anyway," he said. "Water and hydro are major expenses in a building this size."

At Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto, an Orthodox congregation in Thornhill with 750 member families, maintenance staff "did a walk-through" once the power returned on Friday, Aug. 15, said Simon Rucker, co-chair of the shul's house and maintenance committee.

"Almost to a lightbulb, they determined where we could reduce energy consumption while still maintaining a safe environment.

"We've always been very careful about the level of energy we're using," he said, referring to the 90,000-square-foot synagogue. "We've replaced most of our incandescent bulbs with fluorescents, and on a regular basis we turn off air conditioning when it's not needed."

As of last Friday, though, they had not needed to use the barbecues they brought out for a blackout-night wedding.

Where is the Palestinian mainstream?

The terrorist assault on a room full of Jews sitting down to a Pesach seder at the Park Hotel in Netanya two years ago marked a turning point in the way Israel deployed its forces in defence of its citizens. The assault by Hamas terrorists last week in Jerusalem on a busload of Jews, many of them infants and children, appears to have marked a similar turning point in the manner in which Israel will henceforward defend its people against the horrific brutality of the Islamists' terror network.

After the cabinet meeting last Sunday, Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon left no doubt about the course and the nature of Israel's future operations against the planners and the implementers of the deliberate targeting of children. "Whoever supports such activities will not go unpunished," Ya'alon said. "All Hamas militants are potential targets," he continued, "and from our perspective all members of the organization are part of the radical core… If we see that the Palestinian Authority does not deal with this core, we will be forced to do so."

No country on earth, whose laws and values are founded upon the sanctity of and reverence for human life, could object to Israel's decision. Like all peace-loving countries, Israel has an obligation to protect its people and thus, like all such countries, the accompanying right to do so.

The method by which the Israel Defence Forces will undertake the defence of its citizens must, of course, be commensurate with the threat its citizens face. That threat, namely suicide bombing, has never been seen before in the frequency and on the scale with which it has been unleashed against Israel in the last three years.

And the nature of that threat is such that there is no apparent policy that can effectively deter it. For the threat of death is no threat at all to the attacker. Indeed, the attacker's death is part of the weapon's potency. The only effective policy against suicide bombers is pre-emption. Israel must strike at the bomber and the bomber's network before the suicide belts are strapped on.

Not to be overlooked in Ya'alon's statement, however, was his urgent call upon the Palestinian Authority to eliminate terror. The obligation falls first upon this group of Palestinian leaders to prove themselves worthy of being considered a government-in-waiting for the country that is yet to be born. Ya'alon understands the melancholy truth, as do most Israelis, that there will never be true peace between Israelis and Palestinians unless and until the Palestinian mainstream utterly rejects and casts out the terrorists from their midst. In their evil, ghoulish campaign against Israelis, the terrorists are also brutalizing their own people, by increasingly stigmatizing an entire society and consigning it to languish in near perpetual penury.

Where is the Palestinian mainstream?

Says ABA therapy works

Thank you for helping raise awareness about the exorbitant costs, both financial and emotional, families incur trying to raise autistic children ("Autism therapy for kids a financial burden, court told," CJN, July 31). The constant battle for funding, educational supports and integration can wear down the strongest of advocates.

Families are grateful there is funding for ABA (applied behavioural analysis) therapy for children between ages two and five who qualify, but that does not solve the greater problem: all of these children will turn six and enter a school system that is underfunded and ill-equipped to handle the onset of the enormous number of children being diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder.

Private schools are in a position to handpick their applicants, and once they see "diagnosis: autism," we are not accepted into the fold. Who on earth could afford a private school and an education assistant to attend with the special needs student? No one I can think of.

The Jewish community is not very welcoming to children with autism. I have been turned away too many times to count. Zareinu Educational Centre is a wonderful institution for those who need a segregated environment, but for other children ready to enter the "real world," integration and support are key to successful inclusion. The public education system must by law accept all students, regardless of abilities. But the law is less stringent in requiring the system to truly "educate" the children. And so, our battle continues.

ABA therapy is a wonderful approach to bring these beautiful, innocent children "back to us." It works, it can be done. They can learn. We must give them a chance to shine.

Disagrees on targeted killings

In general, I like reading much of what Sheldon Kirshner writes.

But this time around, he is very much off the mark ("Israel's policy of targeted killings is a two-edged sword," CJN, Aug. 7). There is no evidence at all that without targeted killings by the Israel Defence Forces, there would be fewer Israeli casualties. This kind of thinking means accepting Palestinian allegations that Israel is to blame for its misfortune. I am afraid that the contrary is correct, that without the targeted killings or other counter measures, the Israeli casualties would be much higher. The Palestinian terrorists would not have to worry at all and they could concentrate all their energies in planning and executing terror attacks.

It reminds me of the forceful argument the Jews of Belgium and France made in 1942, that every member of the Jewish community requested by the Nazi authorities to present themselves for work camps must do so. They made the work of the Germans in collecting the Jews much too easy.

Their main argument then was that the Nazis would punish us for the noncompliance of a few.

The argument made by some German refugees, that the Nazis will take everyone they will be able to put their hands on in any case, was countered that these refugees must have had some questionable or unclean past.

Kirshner fell into a similar trap in accepting Palestinian propaganda as evidence.

I am afraid nothing is further from the truth. A hands-off attitude would encourage terrorists to increase their killings of Jews.

Re: Joseph Berger's letter Aug. 7

Jewish scholarship has progressed considerably since the obsolete mid-1970s Reform responsum Berger cites in a recent letter to The CJN ("Same-sex marriages not traditional," CJN, Aug. 7). The 1993 policy statement of the Reconstructionist rabbinate, as well as recent responsa of the Reform rabbinate, which cite traditional sources, allow for diversities of theological opinion and urge the inclusion of gays and lesbians in Jewish settings. Berger cannot admit to theological diversity or distinctions between secular and religious legal status. He confuses ethical same-sex sexuality with ancient concepts of sexual coercion, and inaccurately conflates concepts of sexual behaviour and enduring sexual identity.

Neither secular nor liberal Jewish settings dare suggest that gays are welcome as long as they are closeted and silent. Berger's allegation that gays disclosing their sexual orientation in traditional settings are guilty of proselytizing is deeply unjust and injurious to the dignity of congregants seeking honest and respectful pastoral care and affiliation. Imagine your reaction were any secular setting to accuse Jews of sedition merely for disclosing their commitments.

Neither gays nor liberal Jews suggest all people should live or believe as they do, unlike Berger and others. Who is proselytizing and fomenting harmful ignorance and exclusion?

Conversion in non-Evangelical form

Evangelical Christians target the Jewish community through a variety of methods. Well-known is the methodology mentioned in the article "Stealth evangelism and truth in packaging" (CJN, Aug. 21). Less well-known is the theological manipulation of socially conservative religious Jews.

One should be puzzled over the recent homophobic rhetoric currently circulating among some Jewish Canadians, as well as the derision by some displayed toward "secular humanism." While many religious Jews may not believe in secular humanism for their own lives, allowing themselves to be used in a campaign against gay marriage and other emblems of the secular state is indicative of a fundamentalist, literalist interpretation of Torah. While we must watch out for evangelicals' "stealth" methods, we must also watch for theocratic ideology that plays into their hands.

Arafat still calling the shots

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Following last week's killing of senior Hamas official Ismail Abu Shanab, we can expect an escalation in military activity, with Israel and Hamas trading blows.

And the person with the most influence over how long this period lasts is not Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, but Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – who the day before Israel's hit on Abu Shanab, rejected a request that he transfer control of two major PA security services to Abbas and his security chief, Mohammed Dahlan.

Arafat also postponed a discussion of the plan submitted by Abbas and Dahlan for taking action against Hamas and Islamic Jihad after last week's suicide bombing in Jerusalem.

Israel's security cabinet, which discussed the response to the Jerusalem bus bombing, took the expected escalation into account. If the escalation continues, Abu Shanab will clearly not be the last Hamas leader in Israel's gun sights. There are also likely to be large-scale arrest operations throughout the West Bank.

The decision to broaden the scope of arrests was made after Israel discovered that on the same day that a Hamas bomber from Hebron blew up the bus in Jerusalem, members of an Islamic Jihad cell from the West Bank had been en route to a suicide bombing in Haifa, but were arrested by Israeli security.

There is no doubt that Hamas, which has declared an end to the ceasefire, will now try to act against Israel on various fronts. The ludicrous part is that Hamas considered both the Jerusalem attack, which killed 20 people, and another, less deadly suicide bombing last week to be consistent with the terms of the ceasefire.

During the weeks of truce, in which neither the Israel Defence Forces nor the PA security services took action against Hamas, the organization built up its strength and capabilities. Now, it will undoubtedly try to fire Qassam rockets and mortar shells at Israeli towns, to set off roadside bombs and lay ambushes on the roads in Gaza or to attack Israeli settlements. And, of course, more suicide bombings will be forthcoming. Hamas will also try to recruit Islamic Jihad and Fatah cells to join it.

The burned-out bus after the suicide bombing. [Israel and Israel Sun photos]

The statement issued last week by Dahlan's spokesperson, which said Dahlan had been planning to take action against Hamas, but froze his plans because of the killing of Abu Shanab, has been met with scorn in Israel. Why did he not act before? Why did he repeatedly say he has no intention of acting against the terrorist infrastructure?

Dahlan's organization did absolutely nothing in the day-and-a-half following the Jerusalem bombing – which is what led the IDF to act.

Mahmoud Abbas and Yasser Arafat

The security plan that has supposedly just been "frozen" has actually been in the deep freeze for a long time, even though Israel had warned Dahlan repeatedly that his inaction would eventually lead to disaster.

Last week, the PA's Preventive Security Service in Gaza proved that it can act when it wishes: after a booby-trapped bicycle was placed near the service's offices, the service immediately arrested the Islamic Jihad members who were responsible. Two of those arrested were even wounded in an exchange of gunfire during the operation.

When, after the Jerusalem bombing, the United States and Israel pressed Abbas and Dahlan to act against the terrorist infrastructure, they first asked for time to convene the PA cabinet. Then they said they had to bring the plan to the PLO's executive committee, headed by Arafat. But Arafat would not approve it, saying it required additional discussion. And all of this happened before the assassination of Abu Shanab.

At the same meeting, Arafat was asked to hand over control of two major security organizations, the National Security Service and the General Intelligence Service, which he has retained despite the fact the PA's reform plan calls for all the security services to be under Abbas' control. Arafat replied that this demand also needed to be studied. As usual, he did not refuse the request outright, but neither did he give it his approval.

It is impossible to predict how long this latest period of escalation will last. The Americans will surely try to shorten it, through both diplomatic activity and pressure. Israel has informed Washington that it remains committed to the diplomatic process, but it sees no chance of this process succeeding without action against the terrorist infrastructure.

America's stance on the terrorist infrastructure has hardened since the Jerusalem bombing, but it has yet to reach the stage of ultimatums – and for this, Washington deserves criticism.

Before the Aqaba conference, the Americans told Israel that Dahlan would need a lot of time before he would be able to start fighting terror. Israel agreed that Dahlan would need some time to organize, but warned that Hamas would exploit the ceasefire.

When Israel told the Americans that three to four weeks ought to suffice as preparation time before Dahlan could begin taking action, the Americans responded that they would dictate the time limit – a response that generated some sharp exchanges between U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and IDF Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon when the latter visited Washington, D.C.

Mohammed Dahlan

Now, after the Jerusalem bombing, the United States is beginning to issue more forceful demands that the terrorist infrastructure be eliminated immediately. Powell also called on Arafat to immediately transfer responsibility for all the security services to Abbas – something that, under the reform plan, he should have done long ago.

That is a way of pointing the finger of blame at Arafat – but it also confirms that Arafat is the man who makes the decisions, while Abbas, incapable of doing anything on his own, must wait on Arafat's word.

Opinions

Showing up

During my first year in the rabbinate, an experienced colleague gave me some wise advice. To paraphrase the famous Jewish sage Woody Allen, "Showing up is 80 per cent of life."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Actually, he underestimated the percentage. For a rabbi, 99 per cent of life is showing up: to brit milahs, shivahs, etc. Remarkably, what I actually do at these events isn't that important, as long as I show up. Perhaps it's because many people feel these aren't religious events without a rabbi (a notion more Catholic than Jewish). Or it may be the magic factor. Some people actually believe a rabbi's presence brings luck, as if the rabbi were some sort of two-legged amulet.

The mindless appearance is not the exclusive domain of rabbis.

Politicians have to be visible during election campaigns, performing the unremarkable tasks of shaking hands and hugging babies (in this regard, a rabbi is a sort of religious politician as well). Celebrities, in order to remain celebrities, also have to stay in the public eye, waving blankly to the paparazzi. But in actuality, the mindless appearance is significant for everyone, famous or not.

Talk is overrated. Western society assumes every encounter requires non-stop conversation, otherwise things are considered "awkward." (Think of how you feel when you're in the elevator with a stranger.) But this is not a universal feeling. In A Geography of Time, Robert Levine describes his experiences in India, where people "drop by one another's homes, only to sit and remain silent, sometimes … for hours." When Levine asked his friends whether they considered these moments of silence uncomfortable, they couldn't understand why he would consider silence awkward.

While the West is obsessed with verbal interactions, in India, the company counts for more than the conversation. Simply sitting together is a worthwhile pursuit.

Personally, my sympathies are with the Indians. Companionship in its own right is valuable. As the Talmud says, "It is better to sit as two than to sit alone."

I don't look down on profound, intimate conversation. But conversation is not the only route to friendship. Sitting together satisfies our existential need for companionship. When Adam searches for a companion in the Garden of Eden, he isn't looking for banter or insights or a soulmate. He just doesn't want to be alone. He is waiting for another person to show up.

People often feel uncomfortable going to shivahs. They feel they have nothing to say, and think it's pointless to go and sit quietly. The truth is, there is nothing to say. The act of visiting is a gesture of concern that is more eloquent than anything one could say. Showing up is all that matters.

Showing up requires no skill, yet it is immeasurably meaningful. Thank God it's 80 per cent of life.

Israel's citizenship dilemma

Citizenship has been one of Israel's greatest challenges in its dual self-definition as both a Jewish state and a democracy. The Law of Return grants automatic citizenship to immigrants who are Jews, spouses or children of Jews, and to people with a Jewish grandparent. (In the last decade alone, approximately 250,000 non-Jewish Russian immigrants have entered Israel and have become citizens of the state.)

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Non-Jews who marry resident Israelis can apply for residency permits and later, for citizenship. Historically, Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza who married Israeli citizens (usually from among the 1 million Arab citizens living inside Israel's pre-1967 borders) were eligible for the same procedure. As a result, in the last decade, 140,000 Palestinians from the territories have received residency permits on family reunification grounds.

But according to a new citizenship law passed last month, West Bank and Gaza Palestinians will no longer be eligible for Israeli residency if they marry an Israeli citizen. The law applies retroactively to May 2002. Applications submitted after that date will not receive permits, and temporary residency granted before that date will not be upgraded to permanent status.

In practice, this means that the provision applies not just to future marriages, but also to tens of thousands of such mixed families that already reside in Israel. Now, they will either have to live apart, or the Israeli spouse will have to forego the benefits of residence and work in Israel and move to the territories.

To put it very bluntly, Arabs have now been singled out as a distinct group within the general category of non-Jewish spouses of Israelis. And Israelis who are Arab (and are usually those who marry Palestinians) are singled out in the limitation this places on their ability to live in Israel with spouses of their choice. In effect, the new law takes what should be individual considerations on a case-by-case basis and applies them across the board on ethnic grounds.

The bills' sponsors argued it was necessary in light of the security risk inherent in such new residents. In committee hearings on the bill, the security services documented some 20 proven incidents of direct or indirect involvement in acts of terror by members of the group in question.

The second "demographic" argument for the bill resonated with many more Israelis, who hope that limiting formal entry of Palestinians will further protect the Jewish character of the state. Some Israelis believe that Palestinians from the territories often use marriage as a ploy to enter Israel and describe what has been happening as a "creeping right of return".

Both arguments have serious merits, but as generalizations, they're simply incorrect. Acquiring residency permits is already a tortuous procedure that allows for extensive security checks on a case-by-case basis. As it is, permits can be denied or revoked on security grounds at any time. And the assumption that tens of thousands of Palestinians go through fictitious marriages just in order to infiltrate Israel can only be described as conspiratorial thinking.

It isn't often that Arab members of Knesset, the Labor party and the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) all agree. In the Knesset, Israeli Arab MK's were predictably outraged in their denunciation of the law. But when the Labor caucus stormed out of the Knesset committee meeting and later voted against the bill on the floor, more Israelis took note. MK Rabbi Michael Melchior led the opposition, warning against the law's negative connotations and arguing forcefully that there are other ways to screen prospective residents and citizens.

The ADL, though sensitive to the charge that it was being critical of Israeli policy, nevertheless felt compelled to rebuke the passage of the law. ADL national director Abraham Foxman said he hoped it would be repealed when reviewed a year from now (the law has a one-year, renewable term).

In a lecture two years ago, Ami Ayalon, the former head of Israel's internal security service, posed a critical question to his fellow Israelis: "Our real dilemma is the balance between security, peace and the nature of Israeli democracy. Which of these are we prepared to compromise in order to protect the other elements of the triangle? What is our national order of priorities?"

It's a question only Israelis can answer for themselves.

Self-critical without self-loathing

Is Israel an apartheid state, undergoing "fascistization," fooled into fighting by the Israel Defence Forces which, like "every army… wants war, at least every once in a while"? Is Yasser Arafat a peacemaker, with his Palestinian Authority "a group of mainstream moderates who supported the historic compromise with Israel?" Is it true that the Palestinians, "by any reckoning, can only be seen as victims," that "the occupation has ruined every good part of Israeli society" and that a Holocaust "guilt complex" silenced most Europeans, while "at least part of Europe" has heroically denounced Israeli "war crimes"?

Gil Troy in Montreal

Sadly, such myopia comes from some of Israel's "best and brightest," who proclaim themselves "voices of refusal and dissent." In a recent anthology, The Other Israel, two-dozen Israeli academics, attorneys and activists denigrate their country, spewing malice and bias.

As liberals and democrats, North Americans, and especially North American Jews, instinctively cheer lonely dissenters. Those of us who see the complexities of the Middle East conflict, who mourn the suffering of innocents on both sides, want to applaud contemporary prophets seeking "a just peace."

Unfortunately, these essays lack fairness, balance and accuracy. The Other Israel is an exercise in selective perception and mass delusion that minimizes Palestinian terror, otherwise known as "resistance." Joseph's Tomb in Nablus is described as "abandoned in the fall of 2000 under fire," rather than desecrated by a Palestinian mob. We learn that "Since Sept. 29, 2000, the Israeli army has waged a 'dirty war' against the Palestinian Authority" with no mention, in that essay or most others, of suicide bombers or the hatred Palestinian institutions foment. Perhaps most disturbing, in 206 pages overflowing with compassion for Palestinians, Jewish suffering is coldly pooh-poohed as a political posture.

This one-sidedness suggests a bovine instinct to mimic progressive trends and a disgust for one's own people. To explain such fecklessness, many consult the textbook of Jewish pathologies – the self-hatred born of statelessness, the provincial Israeli intellectual's need to curry favour in intellectual circles. Yet considering many western intellectuals' contempt for their own nation and civilization, and so many intellectuals' tendency to back the wrong horse – from being soft on Josef Stalin to "contextualizing" Osama bin Laden – a broader western pathology is also at work.

Fortunately, such decadence is not contagious. While many students ape their professors' politics, others resist. Thirty-seven free-thinking Canadian students recently published a response to the crisis in Israel. The essays, poems and photographs in Gam Yachad (Also Together) engage constructively and intelligently with Israel and Zionism from diverse political and religious perspectives.

Gam Yachad, which is dedicated to "the victims of terror" shows a mix of compassion and passion. While Oxford's Avi Shlaim writes tediously about "A Palestinian David facing an Israeli Goliath," one poet dreams of "the day when/ David and/ Goliath, both boys/ of strength and will, work their bodies/ to exhaustion to extract green from the sand."

These students have endured the on- campus onslaught of anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, yet refuse to cower. One Birthright Israel alumna who wants to "come to terms with her identity," laments the "worldwide" spread of the anti-Israel "poison." David Weinfeld, a Montrealer studying at Harvard, mocks Noam Chomsky for criticizing divestment from Israel while signing a petition advocating it. Chomsky then offers the Orwellian claim that "No one who signs a petition is expected to approve of every word, even of large parts, if the main thrust is appropriate and sufficiently important." Shira Goldberg, a McGill student, writes insightfully about "Zionism Reborn,"urging her peers to "adapt our Zionism to meet the fluctuating factors of the moment." Other essayists do just that, appreciating "The Endurance of Zionism," pondering the "inherent contradiction" of "Zionism and Judaism" and confronting "The Problem with Zionism."

These students see shades of grey. One refuses to be "force-fed the 'official' community policy regarding Israel." Another "understand[s] the anger and frustration that is felt by Israelis and Palestinians alike." Nevertheless, these Canadian students still believe in Israel and Zionism. They seek solidarity in their search for identity and their love for Israel and the Jewish people, even as they develop individual perspectives. They demonstrate that you can be patriotic and thoughtful, self-critical without being self-loathing. Their elders on both sides of the Atlantic should learn from them.

The Kirshner File

Holocaust survivor Anna Heilman fought back

On Wednesday, Sept. 3 at 7: 30 p.m., Unlikely Heroes will have its world premiere at the Varsity theatre in Toronto. The documentary, whose screening is sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, will pay tribute to the courage and resourcefulness of the Jewish men and women who resisted the Holocaust on an epic scale. The film, written and directed by Richard Trank, was produced by two-time Academy Award winner Moriah Films, an arm of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Unlikely Heroes comes on the heels of several other Simon Wiesenthal Center films: In Search of Peace (2001), which examined Israel's quest for peace with its Arab neighbours; The Long Way Home (1998), which looked at the lives of Holocaust survivors as they made their way to what would be Israel; and Genocide (1981), which explored the roots of anti-Semitism.

For Anna Heilman, a 74-year-old survivor and retired social worker from Ottawa who plans to attend the premiere, Unlikely Heroes will have a special resonance. She and a coterie of young women, including her older sister Esther (Estusia), helped to lay the groundwork for the October 1944 revolt in the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp, which is featured in Unlikely Heroes.

The uprising – the subject of a powerful movie entitled The Grey Zone (2001) – was launched by a Sonderkommando unit the Nazis had designated for liquidation. (Before they were murdered themselves, Sonderkommandos stripped Jews of their belongings, herded them into gas chambers and disposed of their bodies in furnaces.)

Heilman, a Polish Jew, arrived in Auschwitz in September 1943 after a horrifying time in Majdanek. In Auschwitz, she and Esther, among other physically strong inmates, were put to work as slave labourers in the Weichsel Union munitions factory. It was there that Heilman devised her scheme to smuggle gunpowder to the Sonderkommandos.

When Trank learned of her role, he sent Heilman a letter. "I believe that your story would be an important addition to our film, especially because of the fact that it shows how women were involved in such activities," he wrote in the spring of 2002.

Heilman, a recipient of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Medal of Valor, does not regard herself as a heroine. "Absolutely not," she said in an interview.

She participated in the uprising, which succeeded in blowing up a crematorium, because she figured her days in the camp were numbered. "We knew we would be killed one way or another," explained Heilman, whose memoir, Never Far Away: The Auschwitz Chronicles of Anna Heilman, was published by the University of Calgary Press in November 2001. "We prisoners did not expect to survive, so we decided to sell our lives dearly."

Heilman composed Never Far Away over a 50-year period, following a forced march to Ravensbruck in 1944. It is based on her diary, which she still has, and on supplementary material edited by her son-in-law, Sheldon Schwartz. The memoir, which received the $2,500 Ottawa Book Award, traces Heilman's life back to her birth in Warsaw on Dec. 31, 1928.

Heilman's parents, Jacob and Rebecca Wajcblum, both deaf, owned a handicrafts factory. The family, which was assimilated, lived in an elegant apartment, filled with objets d'art, at 38 Mila St., just down from 18 Mila St., the headquarters of the 1943 Warsaw ghetto revolt.

Late in 1939, shortly after Germany's invasion and occupation of Poland, the Nazis confiscated her father's plant. Later, he was permitted to establish a workshop manufacturing wooden picture frames. The workshop, which the Germans considered essential, protected the family from immediate deportation.

Heilman's mother rejected a plea by her eldest daughter, Sabina, and her boyfriend, Mietek, to escape to the Soviet Union. "She did not want to give up all her earthly possessions," said Heilman.

Her parents never expressed regret over their short-sighted decision, she said. "Until the last minute, I doubt they realized what awaited them." (Sabina and Mietek escaped to the Soviet Union and later settled in Sweden.)

In her account of Nazi-controlled Warsaw, Heilman describes an atmosphere "soaked with fear" and rife with anti-Semitic propaganda. She claims that Poles welcomed the Germans "beyond their wildest dreams." But in an interview, Heilman said, "The Polish people were at risk themselves. Like any people, some [Poles] were heroes and some sadistic bandits."

Anna Heilman today

While in the ghetto, she joined the left-wing Zionist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair. "My role was to paste posters on buildings to call on Jews to revolt," she recalled. When Hashomer Hatzair leaders discovered that Treblinka, the final destination of many Warsaw Jews, was a death camp, they became determined to fight the deportations.

Heilman's father made frantic efforts to place his family with non-Jewish friends and former employees, but it was too late. The Heilmans were hustled into terribly congested boxcars on a train leaving for Majdanek. Conditions were so appalling that 50 of the 170 passengers died en route.

It was raining when the Wajcblums arrived in Majdanek. This what what Heilman remembers: "Shots were being fired, dogs were barking. People were pushing toward the doors in panic, trampling each other in their haste." Jacob and Rebecca, having been separated from their daughters, were murdered upon arrival. Heilman was assigned to a latrine patrol.

Transferred to Auschwitz-Birkenau, the sisters toiled in the munitions factory.

In Never Far Away, she recalls: "The work provided us with a measure of security and comfort. We were working indoors, and, through the generous offices of the civilian German foreman, our food improved considerably. We spent most of the day away from the camp, away from its daily brutalities, away from the crematoria now fuelled non-stop by the transports from Hungary."

Meanwhile, Heilman and her sister learned that the Polish Home Army intended to attack the camp and required the assistance of insiders like themselves. Buoyed by the prospect of freedom, they began amassing matches, gasoline and all kinds of heavy objects. Much to their disappointment, the assault was cancelled.

But after learning that the Nazis would murder them and replace them with new workers, the Sonderkommandos planned an uprising.

Realizing that the Sonderkommandos were short of weapons, Heilman dreamed up the idea of smuggling gunpowder to them. "We were living on adrenaline, suspended between fear and excitement," she writes.

Heilman and Esther were at work when the revolt broke out. Although it was summarily crushed by the SS, the Sonderkommandos blew up one of the furnaces, thereby saving countless lives. Years later, a survivor in the United States told Heilman that the uprising had spared his life because his Auschwitz-bound train had been diverted.

On the aftermath of the rebellion, traces of the gunpowder were traced to the munitions plant. Esther and three other women, having been betrayed, were tortured and then executed. After the war, the Polish government erected a plaque in their honour in Auschwitz, while Yad Vashem built a monument dedicated to their heroism.

In 1947, following a convalescence in Belgium, Heilman married fellow survivor and Hebrew teacher Joshua Heilman. They immigrated to Israel and lived in Netanya, where their two daughters, Ariela and Noa, were born. Israel enthralled Heilman. "We were intoxicated by independence and traumatized by war," she said. But in the 1950s, after 12 years as Israelis, career opportunities prompted the family to leave Israel.

Israel marked Heilman, but so did the Holocaust.

Ve'ahavta joins humanitarian Canada-Israel exchange program

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Darryl Borden left for Israel last month with a stack of notes from his friends back home in Toronto.

Most of them didn't know anything about the Western Wall, other than that it's in Jerusalem and is a significant site for Jews. Nevertheless, about 25 prayers found their way from park benches and alleyways in downtown Toronto to the nooks and crannies of the Kotel.

"I can't tell you how much of a pleasure it was. It was a great honour," said Borden, the director of homeless initiatives for Toronto-based Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Borden was doing more than delivering notes on his latest trip to the Holy Land. Ve'ahavta and its Israeli counterparts met for their first-ever professional development exchange.

Ve'ahavta swapped ideas and experiences with members of IsraAid, an umbrella group that includes over 35 Israeli humanitarian organizations. For the past year, Canadians and Israelis have been visiting each other's countries to participate in projects of tikkun olam, repairing the world.

"We want Canadians and Israelis to work together in a meaningful way," said Rachel Lasry, director of international initiatives for Ve'ahavta.

It all started a year-and-a-half ago when an Israeli student visiting Canada spent a night with Ve'ahavta's mobile Jewish response to the homeless. Four nights a week, the van delivers sandwiches, coffee, toiletries, clothing and kind words to Toronto's homeless.

"[The Israeli student] just freaked out. He loved it," said Borden from behind the wheel of the van as he scanned his rearview mirror for "clients."

Shortly after the meeting in Israel, five Israeli volunteers from the Youth Medical Cadets in Israel visited Toronto before heading off to Guyana, where they gave workshops in cardio-pulmonary resuscitation.

Aside from sight-seeing and going to the Rolling Stones SARS benefit concert, the Israelis met members of Toronto's Jewish community, underwent intensive training and taught first aid techniques to Toronto's Somali community.

"It's beautiful. You have so much green," 17-year old Yotam Barak said of Toronto.

"It's a great opportunity to meet Jews who are not from Israel," said Ella Hazanov, 18.

There are also currently two Canadian volunteers in Israel working with Elem, an organization that provides services to street youth. One of the volunteers enjoyed his experience so much that he has decided to extend his stay indefinitely, Borden said.

Lasry said the development exchange in Israel was a valuable way to exchange ideas and philosophies on how to deal with homelessness.

"The homeless situation in Israel is quite different than it is here. It's fairly new, but it's becoming more severe. Here, we have people who have been living on the street for generations," she said.

Stressing that each approach has merit, Lasry and Borden both said Elem and Ve'ahavta deal with homelessness differently.

Elem works with fewer volunteers than Ve'ahavta. Those that do volunteer must go through a long screening process. Ve'ahavta takes a more hands-on approach. Volunteers as young as 12 come along on the van.

Elem has also adopted one of Ve'ahavta's initiatives, in which high school students assemble and distribute colourful gift baskets to the homeless.

"We're still exploring this field together. That's why this professional development exchange was so valuable," said Lasry.

While in Israel, Lasry and Borden went out on Elem's van through the streets of Tel Aviv and visited a drop-in centre for prostitutes.

"That was probably one of the saddest meetings that we had," said Lasry, adding that prostitution is a growing problem in Israel.

Rachel Lasry with self-portrait in Tel Aviv

There were happier meetings too. The groups also worked on a program that encourages artistically inclined street youth to sell their work. One Israeli collector has already bought several pieces.

Lasry said another important aspect of the exchange program is that it gives non-Jews a different view of the Jewish community.

"It really does put a different face on Judaism out in the non-Jewish community. There is a face that is not too pleasant. Unfortunately, people feel as though Jews only take care of Jews," Borden said.

People should be more aware of the humanitarian work done by IsraAid members and groups such as Ve'ahavta, Lasry said, "because [Jews are] a small percentage of the world but we do unbelievable international work."

Jewish Life

A divine relationship

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

According to the midrash for Leviticus, the world was created on the twenty-fifth day of Elul, the month we are in presently. We often think of Elul merely as the month preceding Rosh Hashanah. It is a month of preparation for the Jewish New Year, a month of reflection, a month of heightened self-awareness. But Elul has significance in and of itself, and it is this significance that enriches our preparations for Rosh Hashanah.

God, as a single and unique being, began to create the world in Elul. And yet the midrash in Genesis tells us that it is not the world itself that is desired by God but rather the relationships God will have with all that was created.

This divine intent is derived from the numbering of the days of creation within Genesis. The first day is called "day one" but the next day is called "second day" and each subsequent day is likewise termed third, fourth etc. In other words, the first day is numbered differently and therefore stands out. According to a rabbinic opinion, that is because on the very first day of creation, God already desired to be "at one" with humanity and therefore we are told it is "day one." Yet this is only half the puzzle.

The correction to the numbering occurs in the description of the building of the Tabernacle in the desert. Upon completion, the first offerings were brought on the "first day," a phrase that corrects the unusual phrase in Genesis. Thus, the two events – the creation of the world by God and the building of the Tabernacle by people – are seen as events of partnership.

In other words, God begins creation in Elul, but we, as partners, must complete the job by engaging in acts of holiness. To work together as a community, to ensure that everyone has the opportunity to express themselves spiritually, these are acts of holiness that partner with God. When we engage in physical acts of building the world rather than destroying it, we are in fact building our partnership with God. To contribute to this partnership, one need not be a person of high spiritual stature. One need only be a good person who engages in good deeds.

The act of creation was started by God, but it is a process that has no end. Creation renews itself and recycles again and again. Elul is not only the month that leads up to Rosh Hashanah. It is the month when we assess our place in the world at large and ask whether we've held up our end of the partnership.

Defining marriage, exploring the mores of sexuality

By RABBI BENJAMIN HECHT

Guest Voice

A Reform rabbi states that he will marry two Jews of the same sex. No note is made of the fact that he will not marry even a heterosexual couple if one of its members is not Jewish. An Orthodox rabbi declares that marriage specifically permits sexual contact between a man and a woman. Again no note is taken of the fact that he maintains that sexual contact outside of marriage is prohibited, even among heterosexual couples.

The recent Ontario court decision to accept same sex marriages has evoked much discussion and debate, but the vast theological and philosophical issues beyond the narrow focus of this public dispute are being ignored. What is marriage? How do we approach the realm of sexual mores? What is the relationship between lust and love? The discussion of same sex marriages must go beyond the confines of the narrow issue. It demands that we contemplate our basic understanding of human relations in general.

Just 50 years ago, within the context of what was deemed proper behaviour, marriage was essentially an "imposed" concept. If one wished to have sex, to meet the moral requirements of the age, one had to be married. People may have wanted to be married, but essentially there was an imposed, societal reason to get married.

One effect of the sexual revolution of the '60s was the development of a negative attitude towards marriage, specifically the imposed moral requirement that legitimized sex only within wedlock. People started living together, rejecting the need for marriage.

Eventually, people again wished to marry, but these marriages were different from the marriages of the '50s. These were not demanded by society's moral code. They were and are, for the most part, a personal preference, simply reflecting a desire to be married – whatever that means.

Still, to some, such as the Orthodox rabbi noted above, marriage remains an institution that has a practical effect in that it permits sexuality; it is a reflection of a moral system that presents an overall view of sexuality that imposes rules upon its adherents.

From the perspective of most within our society, though, marriage is a reflection of personal desire – the desire of the participants to be recognized as a couple. Herein lies part of the problem with the current debate – divergent views of marriage are being ignored. We must define the meaning of our terms and the philosophical and moral consequences of these definitions.

The matter becomes more complex when we consider the attitude of the Reform rabbi who will marry only Jews. What is this individual saying about marriage? We can speculate that he perceives marriage as a building block of society and that, as one committed to the Jewish community, he deems it proper to perform only the type of marriage that will be part of that community.

But, with this potential answer, we again take marriage out of the personal realm and into the realm of the greater population. Marriage, according to this Reform rabbi, is not to be seen solely in the context of the personal relationship of its two members. This rabbi defines marriage within the context of a greater society; it is a foundation block upon which the society is built. He declines to perform intermarriages because they challenge the society he wishes to build.

A similar recognition must be made in the debate over same sex marriages. The issue is not necessarily personal, reflecting an attack upon individual rights; the issue extends to include the question of how we wish to build our society. Even a totally personal view of marriage has an effect on society and community. A society's position in regard to same sex marriages has a powerful effect on the societal structure. How we define marriage has consequences beyond the realm of marriage itself.

The most difficult problem in considering the concept of marriage, however, is the one we often attempt to avoid – the relationship between lust and love. As much as people may want to separate the mother from the sexual being and distinguish lust from love, the reality of marriage – and family – is that they are interconnected. Romantic love and the warmth of the family begin with physical desire. This is not easy for many to accept.

More importantly, this is not easy to explain. There are certain theological systems and even theories of marriage that attempt to side-step the connection of sex, love and marriage. Yet, the relationship of sex, love and marriage must be explored, especially by anyone who believes in a thoughtful Creator.

Here we must also consider the elements of procreation and family. The term marriage reflects many variant concepts that touch on numerous categories – personal, moral, societal. In discussing marriage, one must investigate to see what one truly means by the term marriage – and then one must determine the far-reaching consequences of this definition.

Marriage is the cornerstone of our society. Permitting same sex marriages is not simply a human rights matter. The question is not whether we permit same sex marriages. The greater issue is what we are permitting. How do we understand the concept of marriage? And what are the consequences of this perception? As we gain the ability to formulate our ideas about marriage, we gain the opportunity to further develop our understanding of life. For our own sake and that of our children, this must be our first commitment.

Jewish Life

Searching for family and friends, part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, many people will reconnect with family and friends to see how life has treated them over the past year and wish them the best for the next. But sometimes finding a long-lost friend or relative can be extremely difficult. That's where the Internet can help. But this week, a different kind of reunification: how Jewish families torn apart by war can use the Internet to find each other.

Can anyone tell me my real name? Who was my mother? Do I have any brothers or sisters? Those are some of the heartbreaking questions you'll find on the Missing Identity Website. The site was created to help children who survived the Holocaust locate information about their past. Reading their stories is like exploring the fragments of a child's memories from over a half century ago.

Natala remembers that she was brought to the Polish Orphanage in Orunia near Gdansk. She also remembers soldiers searching their home. "One day," she says, "the children on the street called her 'dirty Jew'." Natala ran home, wanting her parents to tell her why the children did this and to ask them what a Jew is. But the adults told her she was not their real daughter and that her name was Natala. Natala, who was brought to France in 1947 and to Israel in 1948, is still looking for her past. In addition to her story, the Web site also has a childhood photograph of her and another of her as an adult [http://www.jewishgen.org/missing-identity/].

Another pain-filled page lists parents of children lost during the war – parents who are still trying a half-century later to find out if their children survived. The information is usually sparse, such as in this example: "In 1940, baby Rachel, very thin at the time, was placed in a children's home run by nuns in Mogialev Street" [http://www.jewishgen.org/missingidentity/bulletin.html].

The Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society established its location service about a century ago "to help émigrés re-establish contact with family and friends with whom they had lost touch during the years of massive Jewish migration." It later helped thousands of displaced persons contact their American relatives. You can browse through the current list of people who are being sought or you can initiate your own search for a fee. HIAS location service search request forms can be downloaded directly from their site [http://www.hias.org/Find_Family/overview.html].

The JewishGen Holocaust Global Registry "provides a central place for anyone searching Holocaust survivors, for survivors searching family members or friends, and for child survivors searching clues to their identity." You can type in a family name or view a list of all the people hoping to be reunited [http://www.jewishgen.org/registry/].

The person credited most for reuniting Jewish families is Batya Unterschatz. For almost 30 years, Unterschatz headed (and was the entire staff of) the Jewish Agency for Israel's search bureau for missing relatives department. The bureau closed in 2001, but Unterschatz continues working as a reunification consultant [http://www.tiigrs.org/hadassaArticle.htm]. Two audiocassettes about her work can be purchased online [http://makeashorterlink.com/?T276211A5].

Several other important sites should be consulted for information about Jewish family reunification. The World Federation of Jewish Child Survivors of the Holocaust maintains a family search page [http://www.wfjcsh.org/search.htm]. The Jewish National Fund maintains an official list of the property it has managed that belongs to missing persons from eastern Europe in World War II [http://makeashorterlink.com/?K38A221A5]. You can read about the "Pinkas Hanitzolim," the Registry of Jewish Survivors, created by the Jewish Agency following the Shoah [http://makeashorterlink.com/?F25A621A5]. And the Jewish genealogy site JewishGen has created an excellent resource titled, "How to Find Anyone, Anywhere" [http://www.jewishgen.org/infofiles/find.txt].

It's incredible that even after many years, some people are successful in their searches. Pnina Modlin was born as Pola Mishures in Belarus in 1937. She spent the war years in various Russian orphanages after losing touch with her family. Thanks to dedicated research by her husband, Modlin was able to reunite with her brother 58 years after they were separated [http://www.jewishgen.org/missing-identity/p-pola.html].

Modlin's story has a bittersweet footnote: she died earlier this year on March 22. The Web site says, "Far away in Orsk in the Ural mountains, she is deeply grieved by her brother Avram and his family – the brother she only was reunited with in 1999."

Torah teaches us to 'just say no'

By RABBI MARTIN BERMAN

In this week's parshah, Shoftim, the Torah tells us: " When you come to the Land that Hashem your God gives you, you shall not learn to act according to the abominations of those nations. There shall not be found among you one who causes his son or daughter to pass through the fire, one who practises divinations, an astrologer, one who reads omens, a sorcerer."

The Canaanites believed in the powers of stars, of astrology, and magic. Indeed, most pagan religions, especially those of the ancient Middle East, believed that you could use magic to control the gods. The Torah is proclaiming a different vision. "Astrology and magic is not for you," it tells us. "You have a God. You have prophets. You don't need all these things."

One of the fundamental differences between the Torah and these other religions is the Torah holds that a human being has the power to rise above the forces of nature. There are people who believe that people are bound and subject to the forces of nature. "Forces of nature" can include astrology and sorcery and the stars, and they can also include human passions – "I can't control myself."

One of the basic beliefs of our religion is that humans are in charge of themselves. That is what the verse is telling us here.

Other nations are perhaps bound by nature, by what the "stars say," but "with you it is not like this." You have the ability to say "No."

Even though our instincts would drive us to follow them, we have the power of "Lo ken" – of saying, "That is not the way it is going to be." We have the ability to control ourselves, to say "no" and to overcome nature and even overcome the "decree of the stars." As the Talmud says, Israel has no Mazal – we are not bound by that.

In the debate over modern sexual practices, we often hear that it is not right to deny people with certain tendencies the same rights and privileges as the majority. I believe that is basically a civil question. Considered as as purely a question of civil rights, we can be for or against the right of people to marry one another. But that is not the case in the area of religious sanction. The existence of proclivities is not sufficient to sanction all behaviour.

Every day in davening (our prayers) we say "U'motar ha'adam min ha'beheima ayin." The standard way of translating this phrase is "And the difference between man and animal is minimal." The Ba'alei Mussar, however, explain it as follows: The difference between man and beast is "ayin" – the ability to say "No."

If an animal is hungry, it must eat. If an animal is in heat, it must follow its body. The difference between humans and animals is in our ability to control ourselves and say "No."

This is a fundamental principle of Judaism. The philosophy that "I am overpowered by nature," that "I have to give in," is not a Jewish outlook. We believe we are able to control ourselves. We can just say "no."

Canadian leads exciting project at Hadassah Hospital

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

A Canadian specialist is pioneering an ambitious new research program at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital to help potential victims of Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). Since September 2000, an estimated 2,500 patients have been sent to Hadassah's emergency room as the result of terrorist attacks.

Rhonda Adessky, Ph.D, counsels a patient at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital.

Dr. Rhonda Adessky, Co-Clinical Director at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital Centre for Traumatic Stress and Anxiety Disorders - who moved from Montreal to Israel in November 2000 - is seeing firsthand, the psychological effects of ongoing violence on a daily basis, and is determined to make a difference.

The new program – launched this month - examines the use of early intervention as a means of not merely treating PTSD, but actually preventing it. While healing the physical wounds of terror victims is paramount, this project is aimed at the lightly injured or those who have witnessed a terror incident first-hand and, as a result, are suffering psychological consequences.

Specializing in Cognitive Behaviour Therapy (CBT), Adessky treats a variety of disorders, including Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD), Panic Disorder, Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, and many others.

Cognitive Behaviour Therapy was originally developed and used in the United States to treat single incident traumas such as rape, assault and accidents. It had never been used prior to Hadassah Hospital in a situation of ongoing terrorism and trauma.

"With this new research treatment project, we get a list of everybody who comes through the emergency room at Hadassah – either those who have been very lightly injured or who have witnessed some horrific images," says Adessky. "They have come to the E.R. in shock either directly from an incident, or they were so traumatized that they went home first and their family has forced them to come in. We call these people usually within a day or two."

If, after five days, these patients are displaying any difficulties, they are invited back to Hadassah for a clinical interview. If the hospital – or the patient - believes treatment is necessary, treatment begins within a month of the trauma itself. This quick initiation of treatment is what makes Adessky's project so unique.

"Historically, people suffering PTSD generally let far too much time pass before treatment," says Adessky. "They will say 'oh, I'm fine, it will pass,' and by that time, whether it's three months, six months, or a year without treatment, the disorder is chronic."

Even for those who wait before beginning treatment, there has been a 75% success rate through the use of CBT, with patients showing a 65% reduction in symptoms and a return to normal lives within a few months – a testament to the work of Adessky and her staff.

While Adessky herself concedes that the 75% figure is remarkable, she is still far from satisfied.

"What we want to try to do is actually prevent this onset because by the time they come in to us, they haven't been working, their family system is falling apart, they're angry, they're irritable, they're yelling at their kids," she says. "What we want to do with this new project is help people avoid all these troubles in the first place."

"We would not have been able to implement this major change in care for trauma survivors without generous support from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto," says Professor Aryeh Shalev, Head of the Department of Psychiatric Services, Hadassah Hospital.

New centres of aliyah make their mark

For more than 10 years, aliyah from the former Soviet Union (FSU) has been the main source of immigration to Israel, but according to The Jewish Agency's Andrea Arbel, that trend is changing.

"Over the past decade, there have been one million new olim in Israel, most of whom came from the FSU," says Arbel, who made aliyah herself from the United States in 1986. "But now, we are seeing a dramatic increase of around 400% in people making aliyah from Argentina and Uruguay. France, with anti-Semitism on the rise, has seen an increase of 100%, while aliyah from the United States has increased by roughly 20%."

Despite the record numbers from Argentina last year, Arbel is not sure the trend will continue.

"The threat of the Iraq war killed aliyah in the first three months of 2003," she says. "In Argentina, new elections give the people new hope. The new Prime Minister is saying all the right things, giving hope, so at the moment, aliyah from Argentina is down. Meanwhile, Mexico, Brazil and Uruguay continue to show a dramatic rise in aliyah."

Eleanor Aliama, a 20-year-old new immigrant from Buenos Aires decided that she wanted to make Israel her home after completing high school in her native land, at the age of 17.

"When I was growing up in Buenos Aires, we had a strong, thriving Jewish community," she says. "Then, suddenly, the AMIA building was bombed, the banks went under, and upper-middle class Jewish families who sent their kids to Jewish day schools were left with nothing."

Aliama says that she fell in love with Israel during a Bible study tour in 1994.

"The Israeli guides taught us so much about Israel. It was incredible being there, surrounded by such history and richness of Jewish life. When I went home to Argentina that year, the AMIA building was hit and I asked myself whether this was really the life I wanted for myself. Everything changed for me – and many of my countrymen – after that bombing."

Eleanor made aliyah in March 1998, when she stayed at a JAFI Absorption Centre designed to help new olim learn about, and prepare for Israeli life.

New Israeli immigrant, Eleanor Aliama (l), with Andrea Arbel, Advisor to the Director General of The Jewish Agency for Israel.

"It was tremendous," she says. "I learned Hebrew and English to prepare for my new life in Israel. The day the intifadah started is when I returned for a visit to Argentina. The whole school system infrastructure that I had grown up in was no longer there."

"It's scary to think back to when, even if you had a million dollars in the bank, you couldn't get it out because it was frozen. If you had told me that I'd be standing in line for food, I would have laughed at you back then," she says.

Despite ongoing terrorist violence, Aliama is delighted with her new home, which, she says, is not always easy, and definitely presents different challenges.

"You give yourself hope that things will improve in Argentina, but there is just no money to do anything there. I will stay in Israel happily," she says.

Immigration to Israel is under the auspices of The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), which is financed by the worldwide Jewish Federation system.

Campaign at $20 million one week after launch

By WENDY LAMPERT

While only a week has passed since the launch of UJA Federation Campaign 2004, nearly $20 million has already been raised. Ninety percent of donors contacted to date have renewed their commitment to last year's special gift or pledged even more.

Campaign 2004 follows on the heels of last year's Israel Emergency Campaign, which raised a record $65 million.

"Campaign 2004 is no less than a Global Jewish Action Plan – an urgent, special campaign that expands on last year's emergency effort," said Richard Venn, Chair of Campaign 2004 along with Allan Silber.

"We live in a disturbing and dangerous world – a world which leaves no room for complacency and that demands decisive action, with one nation after another falling victim to a rising tide of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel hatred," added Silber.

UJA Federation Campaign 2004 will continue and extend emergency assistance through allocations to three priority areas:

- Strengthening Israel's weakened social service network
- Countering a global spiral of anti-Jewish and anti-Israel hatred
- Empowering a new generation of Jews to confront those who preach hatred against Israel and the Jewish people

On a recent mission to Israel, UJA Federation Board Chair Leslie Gales, President Allan Reitzes, and Catherine (Kiki) Delaney, President of C.A. Delaney Capital Management Ltd., visited the social service initiatives supported by UJA Federation.

One of the initiatives is the National School Intervention Program, designed to help children cope with the trauma of terror. Developed by the Israel Trauma Coalition, which includes 15 trauma centres across the country, the program includes a pilot project in Jerusalem to train teachers and school guidance counselors on how to recognize children in crisis.

Catherine Delaney (standing, 2nd from left) and Leslie Gales, UJA Federation Board Chair (standing, 3rd from left) shared a meal with one of the Ethiopian Israeli families that makes Kiryat Moshe its home.

"The government of Israel continues to increase its reliance on the non-profit sector to develop and implement innovative projects in which it can participate," noted Reitzes.

Ashalim, another initiative, is a coalition that is involved with parent and child centres and multi-purpose day care centres in the regions of Afula and Hadera, both of which have been hard hit by terror attacks. The facilities offer comprehensive services for families that are having problems managing with day-to-day life in the midst of terror.

The group also visited Kiryat Moshe, a predominantly Ethiopian Israeli neighborhood in Rehovot. For three years, UJA Federation has been supporting a variety of projects in the community to meet the special needs of its residents, such as programs to help with successful absorption into Israeli society. The community has been selected as one of five in the Ethiopian National Project, which will bring even greater resources to address the needs of Ethiopian Israelis.

"I am still recovering from the hectic pace and the emotions of the trip," said Gales. "Our visit meant a lot to all those we saw. They were thrilled that we came to share with them."

More than 35 parlour meetings will be held over the next two months as part of the Israel Today Speaker Series, featuring compelling speakers from Israel and around the world. They include David Horovitz, editor of The Jerusalem Report, Israel Defense Forces military analyst Colonel Miri Eisen and U.S. foreign policy expert Michael Ledeen.

SELAH- giving terror victims a new chance at life

Established 10 years ago, SELAH, The Israel Crisis Management Centre, has already responded to more than 10,000 immigrant victims of terror and tragedy from dozens of countries including the former Soviet Union, Ethiopia, Argentina, Peru, Hungary, and more.

Anna Krakovich

Over the past three years of ongoing terror attacks against Israelis, SELAH volunteers have been in constant demand. More than 500 of those dedicated volunteers have come to the aid of terror victims at the scene of all-too-frequent suicide bombings.

Ruth Bar-On, who founded SELAH in 1993, has seen her Centre become an essential part of the lives of Israel's new olim who have been struck by terror.

"A loss is a loss, and it doesn't matter if it is due to terrorism or not," says Bar-On. "SELAH was established here in Israel because of the vacuum that new immigrants lived in with no support system, either financially or emotionally. It is hard for members of another country to move to Israel; sometimes it's as if they are from another planet, speaking other languages, following various traditions. Unfortunately, we at SELAH are often the only ones who stay with those who are victimized themselves, or who are grieving. They are easy to forget about once the newspaper headlines stop, but we will never forget them."

One woman who knows all-to-well about the importance of SELAH is Anna Krakovich, who came to Israel from the former Soviet Union (FSU) in 1992 with her then nine-year-old daughter, Irene.

"It was so wonderful to be in Israel then, when we were still talking peace," says Krakovich. "My daughter would play and run in the streets with her friends so joyfully and happily. I learned Hebrew and got a job as a history teacher in Afula. It wasn't easy, but we were very happy here, and I was so excited that my daughter was going to grow up in Israel."

That tranquility enjoyed by Krakovich and Irene was suddenly and unmercifully shattered when, on April 6,1994, a suicide bomber in a car detonated himself at a bus stop in Afula. One person was killed in the blast, while eight others, including Anna Krakovich, were injured.

Krakovich sustained third degree burns over 70% of her body as well as several broken bones. She endured multiple surgeries, but is thankful to be alive.

Although Krakovich's tragedy occurred nine years ago, SELAH continues to play as much of a vital role in her well being today, as it did the day after the bombing.

"The only thing that kept me going the whole time I was in hospital was Ruth Bar-On and SELAH," says a smiling Krakovich. "Ruth was the first person I saw at the hospital bedside when I awoke. The first thing she told me was, 'don't worry, Irene is okay.' As long as there are places like SELAH that care for others, we will be all right. There is no way to cope with tragedy when you are a newcomer, an alien, in Israel. Even today, nine years later, I depend on SELAH for the opportunity to continue with my life. It is not the same life I had before, but it is life."

Responding to the need for increased psychological counselling, SELAH has instituted a variety of support seminars and retreats for bereaved and injured new immigrants, giving them a chance to connect with others who have undergone similar tragedies. Together, these victims of terror participate in intensive workshops run by trauma and bereavement professionals.

"My daughter would have been just another abandoned immigrant child with little or no hope for a future," says Krakovich, who also volunteers at SELAH for other victims. "Instead, thanks to SELAH, she has recently finished serving in the Israeli army and is a beautiful, healthy, and happy Israeli citizen."

"We cannot undo fate or change what has happened, but we can, and we do help people carry their burdens and help them move forward so that they can start new lives," says Bar-On.

On Campus

A campus survival guide

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

It isn't until you leave home for the first time that you realize how little you really know.

How do I pay a phone bill? How do I do laundry? Where can I get pizza at 3 a.m? Why does milk go bad so quickly? What am I doing with my life? Who am I?

Having been through the experience at Carleton University in Ottawa, I can now look back, have a good laugh at my own expense and impart my worldly wisdom.

• Shower shoes will save your life. I can guarantee that neither you nor your roommate will want to clean up the mildew in your shower, and your mom certainly won't be there to do it for you. Solution? Head to the dollar store and buy a pair of plastic flip flops. Your feet will thank you.

• Get an alarm clock. There is no way you'll be able to make it to an 8:30 class without it. I also suggest putting it at the other end of the room so you can't hit the snooze button. While no one will be giving out late slips, it's in your interest to get to class on time.

• Try not to set your room on fire. Hot plates and toaster ovens are usually not allowed in residence (My friend managed to sneak one in and actually set his bagel on fire one day). Kettles are usually kosher. Instant soup will be your new best friend.

• There will be tons of odds and ends you will forget to bring with you. It's unavoidable. Here's a short list to help you out: dish soap, hand soap, a kettle, hangers, cutlery, Tupperware, a laundry bag/hamper, laundry detergent and fabric softener.

• Ear plugs are a good investment, especially if you have a noisy roommate who likes to listen to really loud music or to sing while you try to write essays or get some sleep.

• Get a good long-distance plan. While you'll be busy making new friends, you'll also really miss your dispersed high school buddies. Your parents may want to hear from you as well.

• Write down everything in a place where you know you'll remember it. You will be so inundated with assignments, exams and essays that your head will explode trying to remember everything. Write it on the wall, in an organizer or on your forehead if necessary.

• Your campus bookstore will milk every last cent of your tight student budget. Look for textbooks at used book stores, at Chapters or online. Ask older siblings or friends to sell you their books, and check out trading posts. Also, you may want to try sharing textbooks with classmates and split the cost.

Advice for frosh from our seasoned veteran

• Your cafeteria will milk every last cent of your tight student budget. Try making your own lunches sometimes. A loaf of bread and a jar of peanut butter will cost about as much as one meal on campus. Your own food will last longer and will probably be more nutritious.

• Invest in an International Student Identity Card. It will get you discounts on trains, buses, museums, art galleries and hotels. If you have any intention to travel or visit your parents, an I.S.I.C will save you tons of money. You can usually get them for free, or very cheaply, at Travel Cuts.

• Memorize your student number, for you will no longer need your name. From the administration's point of view, your identity will henceforth consist of six, seven or nine digits (depending on what school you're at). Registering for class, finding out your grades, visiting the doctor and reserving books in the library are just a few of the times you'll need your number.

• You have no excuse not to exercise, as your tuition includes the use of the university's gym equipment. Most schools have a few good cardio machines, a running track, a gym and a swimming pool. I took advantage of some of the classes Carleton's athletics department offered, such as yoga and cardio kickboxing. Going to the gym will keep you healthy, happy and energized.

• Get involved. Play intramural ultimate frisbee, write for the campus paper, run for student government, join the chess club. Whatever makes you happy. Immersing yourself in campus life is a great way to make friends with people who have similar interests and will give you a much-needed break from studying.

• Your campus Hillel is an invaluable resource. There are certain challenges unique to Jewish students. What if an exam or assignment due date falls on Yom Kippur? Where can you find kosher food for Passover? Where can you turn if anti-Israel demonstrations on campus upset you? Hillel is also a good place to meet nice Jewish boys and girls, and make new friends.

• Your life is not confined to campus. It's a big world out there. If you're living away from home, get to know your new city. Check out museums, farmers markets, restaurants and parks. Look into student deals on bus passes to make getting around more affordable.

• Professors' office hours are there for a reason. They might look scary standing behind the lectern in a 400-seat lecture hall, but generally speaking, professors are very personable people. Drop in and introduce yourself. Profs enjoy getting to know their students and are usually more than willing to answer questions and help you out.

• Whatever you do, don't procrastinate. Unless you have the superhuman ability to freeze time (and if you do, what's your secret?) there is no possible way to finish an assignment the night before it's due. Give yourself plenty of time to do school work. You'll need every millisecond of it.

• These are the best years of your life, as the cliché says. You will inevitably run into hurdles and disappointments, but you mustn't let them get you down. You'll learn more this year than you will have in all the years of your life up to this point combined. Enjoy it.

Israel Experience centre opens at BJCC

Increased demand for Israel Experience trips and related programs has led UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to open the Toronto Israel Experience Centre (TIEC) at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

The centre, which began operating July 2, will officially open Sept.10, when it will hold an open house.

"Any large city that takes Israel Experience programs seriously would do itself an injustice by not having a centre focused on developing those programs," said Annette Crandell, who runs the centre.

"By having the centre and staff dedicated to following up with participants, we can help make sure that people who have been turned on to Israel and Jewish life by their experience continue to remain involved in the community," she adds.

The TIEC, located in rooms 115 and 256 of the BJCC, offers advice about the most suitable Israel Experience trips, as well as resources for participants on how to stay involved in Jewish life upon their return.

The centre promotes programs that offer participants a chance to learn about their Judaism and develop leadership skills. They include Birthright Israel; volunteer opportunities through Partnership 2000, which twins Toronto with the Eilat region; Otzma, a year-long young leadership program of volunteering and studying in various Israeli locations; and scholarship programs for Israeli universities.

"Opening the centre is helping us be more accessible to the public. The growth in our programming influenced the need for this public face," Crandell said.

"The sky's the limit at this point – we are now prepared to handle the growth we expect to see in the coming years," she said.

"We want to be the starting point for a lifelong commitment to Israel and Toronto's Jewish community. The people who walk through these doors are our future leaders."

Volunteers build bridges in Israel

For most university students, summer vacation is about rest, relaxation and making money for school. But this year, four community-minded young Toronto women took on a unique challenge as volunteers in Israel.

Devra Jackson, 20, Dana Eilath, 21, Laurie Bittan, 23, and Leah Epstein, 25, recently returned from six weeks of living and volunteering in Eilat as participants in Partnership 2000.

Partnership 2000, or P2K, is a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto program that offers Diaspora Jewish communities the opportunity to interact with Israelis while helping develop Israel's outlying regions. Co-operative and innovative programs centre on immigrant absorption, population growth, educational advancement and human needs. Toronto's P2K twinned region includes the city of Eilat and nearby Kibbutz Eilot.

Canadians, from left, Leah Epstein, Devra Jackson, Laurie Bittan and Dana Eilath get ready to board a plane to Eilat for their Partnership 2000 volunteer experience.

The young women not only successfully connected with Eilat, they also discovered a home away from home.

"We really became part of the community," Epstein said. "You see the programs and projects you work on evolving. You actually get to see your efforts materialize into something tangible and important."

The women worked on several different projects during their stay that were at times difficult and demanding, but always rewarding, including an after-school program for children from broken homes, the creation and promotion of a summer camp program, caring for children in foster homes and working with disabled youngsters in a therapeutic horseback riding program at a nearby kibbutz.

The people in the Eilat community left a deep impression on them the Canadians say, adding that they were awed by the dedication of the program staff with whom they worked.

"I now recognize how Israel and the various communities within it really take care of each other. It's inspiring," Eilath said.

They were also amazed by the warmth and kindness with which they were treated.

"We worked with Eilat residents of all ages, and everywhere we went, we were welcomed with open arms, sometimes literally!" Jackson said.

Bittan said she had a hard time leaving after such a wonderful experience. "I'm already planning on going back," she said.

71 year old loses 20 pounds

"After years of yo-yo dieting, I lost 20 pounds and now fit nicely into a size 8. I'd tried everything else: shots, diet pills, liquids, and so on. I suffered with all of them, and in a matter of six months the weight returned and then some.

Dieting is no good. Hypnosis encourages you to eat properly and you never feel hungry. All cravings are gone. I exercise almost every day, not because I have to but because I am motivated and enjoy it.

Before I complete this unsolicited testimonial, I must mention another benefit of hypnosis. I had not been able to sleep nights without taking sleeping pills. I have learned to relax, so much so that now I am able to fall asleep in the most comfortable relaxed state, without medication. I could go on and on praising the qualities and benefits of hypnotherapy.

Thank you, Positive Changes !!!"

Coast to Coast

A surprising statement from Neil Macdonald

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

There is much in Neil Macdonald's retrospective that aired Aug. 17 on CBC's Foreign Assignment, hosted by Ian Hanomansing, that deserves critical attention – including Macdonald's claim that he was the target of a campaign by "organized Jewry worldwide" last fall. While much of Macdonald's reporting has already been discussed in several previous "According to Reports" columns, there was something quite new and unexpected in his latest remarks.

"One of the things I noticed in the Middle East," Macdonald said, " and I found puzzling since I got back to Canada, is this very, very politically correct notion of constantly repeating that Islam is a religion of peace. And it may well be.

"But the fact of the matter is that the way it's preached by some of its greatest figures – these are the Islamic equivalent of bishops and archbishops – is terrifically violent. The Sheikh of Al-Azhar University, the Grand Muftis of Jerusalem, Mecca, Medina, Tehran, certainly, I've listened to a lot of these speeches on Friday afternoon in those various capitals and I'm just thunderstruck by the sheer vi[olence] – 'destroy this, uproot this, kill this, annihilate that, the West, Israel' – it's just exhortation to violence."

Macdonald cited parts of sermons by various prominent sheikhs, such as Sheikh Abdel Razik of Gaza, who said: "Allah, wreak vengeance on the Jews and the Americans."

He also quoted Sheikh Baqir Abdel Rezik Samara'i of Baghdad: "Who are you, the sons of apes and pigs [i.e., the Jews] to threaten Mohammed, whose Lord is Allah and also Gabriel and the Angels?!"

The clips and translations were provided by the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), which Macdonald described as a "pro-Israel research group in Washington." Its impeccable work is relied on by many leading journalists, including the New York Times' Thomas Friedman.

Indeed, Macdonald himself admitted that while "pro-Israel groups" collected these statements, the CBC itself "put them up," apparently referring to its Web site.

"In the Arab world," Macdonald continued, "this is the context, the backdrop against which this [violence] is happening. This is the vision that a lot of people see regularly in the Arab world. This is the filter that they are straining all of this through."

During his tenure in the Middle East, Macdonald did occasionally draw attention to anti-Israel incitement in Palestinian authority textbooks and in the mosques. But he gave it no sustained treatment. This phenomenon is pervasive and devastating, especially since an entire generation of Palestinian youth has been raised to hate and vilify Israel and the Jewish people. It is not surprising then that so many commit heinous acts, including suicide bombings that tragically take the lives of innocent Israelis.

In general, the frightening growth of anti-Semitism throughout the Arab and Muslim world deserves far more attention than it has thus far received in the Western media. A glance through MEMRI's Web site, especially the section "Arab Anti-Semitism Documentation Project" (www.memri.org/anti-semitism.html), shows just how widespread the hatred is. The offensive material includes official Egyptian, Saudi, and Syrian versions of Jewish blood libels; many comparisons of Zionism to Nazism; a number of Holocaust denials; and statements about international Jewish conspiracies.

Still, Macdonald's remarks on Foreign Assignment are important and point the way for the CBC to explore this vital subject in greater detail.

Winnipegger raising funds to restore looted gravestones in Poland

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Winnipegger Viktor Lewin is seeking funding to restore looted gravestones to the Jewish cemetery in his father's hometown of Losice, in eastern Poland.

"The stones were taken out of the cemetery by the Nazis in 1942 and used to build a fence and patio on a house," says Lewin, a city bus driver. "Other gravestones were used to shore up a bunker. It was heartbreaking to see. It was sadistic and cruel."

Lewin and other children of survivors from Losice are determined to put the gravestones back in the cemetery. "I'll do it myself if I have to," he says.

He says that there are between 200 and 300 gravestones and estimates the project will cost about $10,500.

Losice is located about 75 miles east of Warsaw. In the 1920s, Lewin reports, the town had a Jewish population of about 3,000, equivalent to 70 per cent of the population.

Shortly after the war began, Lewin's father, Jakob, and his three siblings crossed the border into Russia at their parents' urging. The parents stayed behind with their five younger daughters. On Aug. 22, 1942, the Nazis gathered all the remaining Jews in Losice and marched them 30 miles under a hot, humid sky to the rail depot at Siedlice, where they were transported to Treblinka.

The four older Lewin children went first to Minsk, then south to Kovel, where they were arrested by the Communist secret police and interned in a lumber camp in the Urals.

Jakob met his wife in a displaced persons camp after the war.

While Jakob's sister and brothers came to Winnipeg, he went first to New York and then to Indiana, where he worked in the steel mills. Eventually, he came to Winnipeg to be reunited with his brothers and sister.

Viktor Lewin's interest in the Losice gravestones was piqued by his efforts to find other relatives who may have survived the war. While unsuccessful in that regard, he connected with Warren Grynberg in England and Yitzhak Eisenberg in Paris, the children of Losice Jews. Last August, the three of them along with Lewin's daughter, Brianne, went back to Losice.

"The townspeople were very friendly and co-operative. They went out of their way to be helpful. They took us around to some of the older people who remembered what went on and where people lived and what work they did before the war," says Lewin.

He reports that the 3.5 acre Jewish cemetery had been turned into a park by the Communists. A bandstand had been built in one area.

"They were dancing on our graves," Lewin notes bitterly.

The three men are working with Norman Weinberg of Buffalo, who heads the Jewish Poland Cemetery Restoration Project. "Once we start restoring the gravestones, we don't think the work will take very long," Lewin says.

He, Grynberg and Eisenberg are heading back to Losice this month for three weeks. This time, Lewin will be bringing with him a number of books about Jewish history, culture and religion, contributed by the Kaufman-Silverberg Library – Winnipeg's Jewish library – for the high school in Losice.

For more information on the project, see www.zchor.org/losice/losice.htm.

Pakistani man gets death threats for 'articles against Islam'

By ELYSSE ZAREK
and LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Interns

HAMILTON — Police here are investigating a death threat found earlier this month in the mailbox of Tahir Aslam Gora, an exiled Pakistani writer and publisher who criticizes Islamic states for their treatment of women and intolerance towards Jews and Christians.

"Remember we will not spare you. Your articles are against Islam. Your idea of New Islam is enough to kill you. Now true muslims will kill you and your family. You have no room on earth," read the anonymous typed note. It was signed by "True Muslims."

Gora, 40, is no stranger to threats. He fled Pakistan after being kidnapped, interrogated and jailed for two weeks by men with official-looking badges who called him a traitor to Islam because of articles he wrote criticizing, among other things, the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. He came to Canada as a political refugee in April 1999 in the hope he would be free to express his views here.

He began to think critically about Islam as a Grade 9 student in Pakistan. While Urdu translations of Western books were rare, he managed to find a Bertrand Russell book at the library, which he said opened his eyes to other points of view.

"I realized that a writer in some Western country is writing such sensitive and difficult things, but he [was allowed to live]," Gora said, saying someone expressing similar views in Pakistan's religious society would likely have been killed.

In Toronto, where he lived until recently, the father of three published an Urdu-language newspaper called Watan for a year-and-a-half. In his articles, Gora, himself a Muslim, expressed the need for a reformed, more humanized Islam.

"I'm emphasizing again and again that we have to be compatible with the rest of mankind. We have to leave our orthodox ideas and attitude," he said in an interview in his sparsely decorated living room overlooking Hamilton's steel mills.

Gora received a lot of criticism from Toronto's Muslim community for publishing a picture of an Israeli child who had been killed by a suicide bomber. In the photo's cutline, he expressed sympathy for the young girl's family. He was also threatened for publishing photos of beauty pageant contestants, something frowned upon in the Muslim world.

Tahir Aslam Gora

[Elysse Zarek photo]

When advertisers began pulling their ads and angry readers threatened to kill him, Gora stopped publishing Watan.

In 2001, PEN Canada and Canadian Journalists for Free Expression published action alerts on their Web sites.

"An exiled Pakistani journalist living in Toronto has been the target of a series of death threats and acts of intimidation during the last few months," read the notice. The organizations called on citizens to call police and members of Parliament on Gora's behalf.

He said both groups, which he belongs to, have been very supportive.

Gora moved his operation to Hamilton in March and began a new Urdu publication called the Hamilton Times. He included his address and phone number, which, in hindsight, he admits was a mistake.

In addition to the note in his mailbox, Gora has received four bomb threats on his voice mail and his distribution van has been tailed.

"I rarely go out," he said. When he does, he keeps a watchful eye out for anyone suspicious.

He has since stopped publishing the Hamilton Times because advertisers again withdrew their support.

While Gora said some Canadian Muslims support his point of view, none have stepped forward to defend him.

> 'We have the right to express our point of view but when some other person says something, that means that guy's hurting us'

Gora said although many Canadian Muslims fled persecution in their native countries, they still defend regimes like the Taliban in Afghanistan. To demonstrate their hatred, Gora pulls out an Urdu journal with a photo of Adolf Hitler and George W. Bush standing side by side giving the Nazi salute.

"They have one-way traffic. They say everything is good for us but we don't want to give rights to others. We have the right to express our point of view but when some other person says something, that means that guy's hurting us," he said.

Gora said the recent death threats have shaken him badly. His wife and children were out of town visiting family when the note came and he doesn't want them to find out and worry.

Right now he is looking for a job that will pay the bills, but wants to resume publishing his views as soon as his financial situation improves.

"I cannot stop myself from writing."

The Hamilton police officer in charge of Gora's case could not be reached for comment.

New monument recalls Canadian Jews who served in WWII

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

A new monument at the Royal Canadian Air Force Memorial Museum in Trenton, Ont., was unveiled Aug. 15 in honour of nearly 500 Canadian Jews who gave their lives serving in World War II.

The ceremony took place as Ontario recovered from the largest blackout in North American history. But retired Brig.-Gen. Paul Hayes, who was MC at the ceremony, said despite the blackout, about 150 people managed to come from Toronto, Montreal, Kingston, and Ottawa.

The cairn stands nearly six feet high and is made from grey granite. It consists of three slabs that stand side by side upon a foot-high platform.

"It's plain, but very effective," Hayes said.

The monument was donated by retired Flight Lieut. Howard B. Ripstein of Montreal.

During the 45-minute ceremony, Ripstein spoke of his experiences carrying out dangerous bombing runs over Nazi-occupied Europe. Although the cairn mainly commemorates Jews who gave their lives serving in the air force, Ripstein said it was important for the monument to be inclusive of all religions.

On each of the granite slabs are inscriptions in English, French and Hebrew that read,"Erected in memory of the Jews who made the supreme sacrifice as members of the Canadian, Commonwealth and Allied air forces and the valour of the comrades of all denominations."

In attendance were several dignitaries, including MPs Art Eggleton and Paul Macklin. A busload of war veterans from Toronto, as well as Jewish and Christian clergy, air force personnel and members of the public also braved the sweltering summer heat to celebrate the new monument.

Members of the General Wingate Branch of the Royal Can\adian Legion (L to R): Al Rubin, Leonard Berger, Sam Romberg, Harold Kates, Izzy Goldstein and Lionel Mernick.

Jack Cahan, a retired squadron leader and national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, said he was disappointed he could not attend the ceremony due to the power outage. The cairn, he said, will remind Jews of the often overlooked role they played in Canadian military history.

Cahan said Jews made up the largest percentage of any identifiable group that enlisted during the World War II. About 1.5 million Jews, including 17,000 from Canada, joined the Allied forces worldwide. Unfortunately these facts are often omitted from history textbooks, he said.

"We had a choice. We joined up and did it," Cahan said. "We fought side by side, and we pulled our own weight."

The cairn, pictured above, commemorates Jews who served the Royal Canadian Air Force during the Second World War.

Halifax's Pier 21 tells immigrant story

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

HALIFAX — From 1928 to 1971, almost 70,000 Jews are known to have arrived here at Pier 21, Canada's last remaining immigration shed.

Since 1999, Pier 21 has been a national historic site, and it has been turned into a museum and archives, paying tribute to the one million immigrants and 100,000 refugees and displaced persons for whom it was the gateway to Canada, as well as recognizing the immigration officers, medical staff and volunteers who met them. Close to half a million Canadian troops passed through Pier 21 as they headed to Europe.

A plaque near the entrance lists 69,776 Jewish immigrants, although there were likely more who were recorded as Russian or Poles, for example.

The driving force behind turning what was a derelict building overlooking Halifax harbour into an interactive exhibition that tells the stories of the diverse newcomers who passed through over the decades is Ruth Goldbloom, a veteran community volunteer with a reputation for getting things done.

From 1993-99, she chaired the effort to raise the $9 million needed to restore the rat-infested shed. She is proud that was accomplished with an overhead of just three per cent. "When I travelled across the country, I stayed with family and friends," she said.

Now, as head of the Pier 21 Foundation, she is looking for $8.6 million for a five-year plan to expand Pier 21 into Canada's Immigration Centre, which will perserve the broader story of immigration from 1867 to the present day.

Raising awareness that Canada is a nation of immigrants comes naturally to Goldbloom. Her maternal grandfather, Joseph Claener, arrived in Halifax in 1909 from Russia and was processed at a pier that no longer exists. Four years later, he brought over his wife and daughter, and the family settled in the small town of New Waterford on Cape Breton Island, where Goldbloom (née Schwartz) was born and raised. Her father had a small grocery store.

Goldbloom left New Waterford to attend McGill University and met her husband, physician Richard Goldbloom, in Montreal.

"Pier 21 is a tribute to the struggles and hardships of immigrants, and, other than the First Nations, we are all immigrants. We came for the same reasons, to escape poverty, persecution, or for religious freedom, a better life for their family," said Goldbloom, who in 2000 was appointed an officer of the Order of Canada for her work. "When you add in the workers and volunteers, one in five Canadian families has some asssociation with Pier 21."

Goldbloom said Pier 21 has had about 600,000 visits since it opened.

Among those who have deposited their story with Pier 21 is Ontario Court of Appeal justice Rosalie Silberman Abella, a former displaced person who landed there in 1950 as a toddler. The family, which had lost many members in the Holocaust, sailed on an American troop ship. From Halifax, they immediately boarded a train for Toronto.

"Those of us who were permitted to come to Canada were given a precious gift, the possibility of endless possibilities and the freedom to pursue them in safety and security. That is why every immigrant who started at Pier 21 cherishes this country and its people," Abella says.

Other well-known Canadians and Pier 21 alumni, whose quotes adorn the walls include author Peter C. Newman and journalist Joe Schlesinger. Sir Winston Churchill biographer and Holocaust expert Martin Gilbert also offers his comments. He was a four-year-old wartime evacuee from Britain.

Pier 21, which is open year-round, is located at 1055 Marginal Rd., Halifax.

Winnipeg shul merger helps smaller congregations

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Fallout from last year's merger of north Winnipeg's three largest synagogues has given a boost to two smaller shuls in the area and has led a breakaway group to plan services at a hotel for the High Holy Days.

Last July, the Rosh Pina, Beth Israel and Bnay Abraham congregations came together under the name Etz Chayim. The new shul is housed in the former building of the Rosh Pina, the oldest and largest of the merged congregations.

The Bnay Abraham was a traditional shul with mixed seating, while the other two merged congregations were egalitarian, as is the new one.

Most members of Bnay Abraham's daily minyan moved to the Chavurat Tefila Synagogue, giving that small Orthodox shul in north Winnipeg a membership boost, as well as a daily minyan for the first time in years.

As well, some former members of Beth Israel and Bnay Abraham are said to be unhappy about being part of such a large congregation – there were 1,700 people at Etz Chayim for the High Holy Days last year.

This year, the 75-family Chevra Mishnayes Synagogue, a 91-year-old traditional north Winnipeg shul led by longtime cantor Gerry Daien, has moved to attract disaffected Etz Chayim members by voting to move to mixed seating in time for the High Holy Days.

"Every member received a ballot in the mail, and 70 per cent voted in favour of mixed seating," said Grant Zipursky, the synagogue's co-president.

"We wanted to try to attract more families from Etz Chayim," he said.

The Chevrah Mishnayes sanctuary holds about 450 people. Last year, Zipursky said, attendance for the High Holy Days was up 40 per cent from the previous year.

"Since we switched to mixed seating, we have had about 20 new families join us, and we are getting a lot of calls," he said.

He is adamant, however, that the synagogue will not become egalitarian.

Loving Spoonfuls celebrates grandmother's cooking

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Carol Sevitt, author of The Loving Spoonfuls Cookbook: Cooking with the Greatest Grandmas in the World, knows what makes grandmothers' cooking taste so good.

"They add love. When they cook, they put their hearts and souls into it," she said in an interview.

Sevitt, a freelance writer who teaches at Ryerson University, was inspired to write the book from W Network's show The Loving Spoonfuls, created and produced by her brother Allan Novak.

In each episode, host David Gale features a different grandmother who cooks up a favourite dish while chatting with Gale.

For her book, Sevitt included recipes, background information and interviews with almost 40 Canadian grandmothers – five are Jewish – from different ethnic backgrounds.

A common bond between all the grandmothers, she said, is that they're willing to put time into their cooking. "They don't necessarily want fast and easy.

"I think it had a lot to do with the generation. Fewer women worked, and cooking was their identity. They were the wives and mothers, and they were in charge of food preparation. They took ownership of the kitchen."

Many had been through the war and had endured tremendous hardships, she said. "One grandmother from Holland talked about being so hungry during the war that she resorted to eating tulip bulbs. When you've experienced hunger, food takes on a new meaning."

The grandmothers, who range in age from 63 to 92 "run the gamut, from a Sudanese diplomat's wife to a German ex-stripper; they bring to the book a cultural history of Canada. Their commonality though, is that they all express themselves through food."

The grandmothers had incredible stories, she said. "A number of them had reversals of fortune. An Indian grandmother lost her son-in-law and two grandchildren in the Air India crash.

"None are too busy to cook, however, They're proud of their recipes and they love watching people eat.

"Most of them don't write or paint; their artistry is through their food. They create culinary masterpieces."

Loving Spoonfuls is more than just a cookbook, said Sevitt. "It's a celebration of older women who are often marginalized. By appearing in this bopk they suddenly became stars. They felt that what they did best was being acknowledged and valued."

The biggest challenge, Sevitt said, was getting the recipes straight. "It was difficult translating the recipes into exact measurements, but I hired professionals and each recipe was tested.

"Grandmothers know how to cook from experience, but they aren't always able to get the proper recipe down. The recipe testers are scientists and they know what to do to get reliable results."

Is this pride in cooking part of a lost generation? "There will always be people interested in food, but the difference is that the 'masterpieces' will be reserved for special occasions. They will not be part of day-to-day life," said Sevitt.

She offers the following recipes, courtesy of several bubbies.

Carol Sevitt with a Foreword by David Gale

AUNT REBECCA'S BABKA
From the kitchen of Bubbie Ruthy Gale

2 tsp. granulated sugar
½ cup warm water
2 pkgs. (each 2¼ tsp.) active dry yeast
1½ cups light (5 per cent sour cream)
6 tbsp. granulated sugar
¼ tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. kosher salt
2 eggs, at room temperature
¼ cup margarine or vegetable shortening
6 cups sifted all-purpose flour (approx.)
8 to 10 pecan halves (optional)

Coating:
1 cup granulated sugar
3 tbsp. ground cinnamon
½ cup vegetable oil

Dissolve sugar in warm water; sprinkle yeast over top. Let stand for 10 minutes or until frothy; stir. Warm sour cream in a microwave-safe bowl in microwave. Pour into mixer. Add sugar, baking soda and salt; mix well using dough hook.

Mix in yeast mixture, then eggs and margarine. Gradually mix in about 5 cups of the flour, adding more flour as necessary to make a sticky dough. Mix for 3 minutes longer. (If making by hand, in a large bowl, make a well in the centre of 5 cups of the flour; place other ingredients in well and mix together, incorporating flour and adding more as necessary to make sticky dough.)

Turn out dough onto lightly floured surface. Knead for 7 to 10 minutes, or until smooth and shiny, incorporating enough flour to prevent sticking. Transfer to a greased bowl, turning dough to grease all over. Let rise in a warm, draft-free place for about 1 hour, or until doubled in bulk. (Dough has risen enough when indentations remain in top after poking with 2 fingers.)

Punch down dough and turn over. Cover and let rise again until doubled in bulk, about 1 hour. Turn out dough onto a lightly floured surface. Kneed a few times to form a ball. Pat out dough into a rectangle about 14 x 10 inches. Cut into about 40 pieces (each about 1½ inches). Grease 10-inch bundt pan very well. Place a pecan (if using) in each ridge.

Coating:
In a small bowl, combine sugar and cinnamon. Dip each piece of dough in oil to coat lightly on all sides, then roll in cinnamon sugar.

Place pieces in bottom of pan just touching each other to make a ring. Repeat to make second ring on top but closer to tube side, then make third ring on top closer to outside of pan.

Fill pan only half full, as dough will rise more. (Use any remaining dough to make mini-babkas or rolls.) Cover and let rise in a warm, draft-free place until doubled (should reach top of pan), about 30 minutes.

Bake in 350-degree oven for 30 to 45 minutes or until babka pulls away from sides of pan and bottom sounds hollow when tapped. Let cool in pan for 20 minutes. Invert onto rack. If you can wait, let cool for another 20 minutes! Yields: 12 servings.

MARY'S MEMORABLE MANDELBROT
(Almond Biscotti)
From the kitchen of Bubbie Mary Finson

Serve mandelbrot with a hot cup of coffee for a sip-and-dip delight.

3 eggs
½ cup granulated sugar
½ cup vegetable oil
2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1½ cups cornflakes cereal, crushed pinch of cinnamon
40 whole almonds

In a bowl, combine eggs, sugar, and oil. Mix in flour and baking powder until moistened. Add cornflakes and mix until combined. Divide batter in half. Shape each half into a log. Place well apart on greased baking sheet. Sprinkle logs with cinnamon.

Press whole almonds in row along top. Bake in 350 degree oven for 25 to 30 minutes, or until golden brown. Remove and let cool for 5 minutes. Transfer logs to cutting board and slice diagonally into ½ inch thick cookies. Place flat on baking sheet. Return to oven (turned off but still warm) to let dry for 1 to 2 hours. Yield: about 40 cookies.

SEPHARDI FISH BALLS

From the kitchen of Nonna Etty Cohen

1 lb. ground fish (such as pike or whitefish)
2 cloves garlic, crushed
¼ tsp. ground cumin pinch of salt
pinch of hot pepper flakes
1 egg
¼ cup (approx.) dry bread crumbs vegetable oil for frying

Sauce:
1 cup water
1½ cups tomato sauce
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. vinegar
1 tbsp. tomato paste juice of half lemon
¼ tsp. salt
pinch of ground cumin pinch of granulated sugar
pinch of hot pepper flakes
pinch of turmeric

In a bowl, mix together fish, garlic, cumin, salt, hot pepper flakes, egg, and enough bread crumbs to make firm consistency. Cover and refrigerate for at least 2 hours, or overnight.

With fingers dipped in oil, form fish mixture into 1½-inch balls, then elongate slightly into a cigar shape. In a large saucepan, heat enough oil to come 1 inch up sides of pan over medium-high heat. Fry fish balls in batches, until brown and crisp on outside. Transfer to tray lined with paper towel to drain.

Sauce:

In a saucepan over medium-high heat, bring water, tomato sauce, oil, vinegar, tomato paste, lemon juice, salt, cumin, sugar, hot pepper flakes, and turmeric to a boil. Reduce heat and add fish balls to sauce. Simmer for 5 to 10 minutes or until fish balls are cooked through.

Tip:

If you don't have a meat grinder to grind fish, chop cold fish in a food processor in small batches until fine, but not mushy. For crisper fish balls, cook over medium heat in oil until golden and cooked through, and serve with simmered sauce poured over.

Variation:

Sometimes Etty buys fillet of sole and grinds it up for use in this recipe. In fact, any mild-tasting white fish can be used. Yield: 4 servings.

PLUMP POTATO PIEROGIES

From the kitchen of Bubbie Ruth Zimmer

Filling:
6 large white potatoes, peeled
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 large onions, chopped
1 cup shredded old Cheddar cheese salt and pepper

Dough:
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 egg
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
pinch of salt
warm water

Filling:

In a saucepan of boiling salted water, cook potatoes until tender. Drain well; mash, adding butter or margarine. Meanwhile, heat oil in skillet; fry onions. Set aside some of the fried onions for topping. Add remaining onions to hot mashed potatoes. Mix in cheese. Season with salt and pepper to taste.

Dough:

In a bowl, stir together flour, egg, oil, and salt. Mix in enough warm water to make soft dough. Gather into ball and transfer to floured surface. Knead just until elastic.

Roll out dough to ¼-inch thickness. Using 2½-inch round cookie cutter, glass or empty, clean 10-oz. soup can, cut out circles from dough, re-rolling scraps and cutting out more. Place heaping spoonful of the filling onto half of 1 circle; fold opposite side of circle over filling to form half-moon and pinch firmly to seal.

Place on floured paper towel. Repeat with remaining circles and filling. (At this point, if following Ruth's method, complain to your husband that you are tired and that your back hurts.) In batches (about 10 at once), transfer pierogies to a large saucepan of boiling salted water; with wooden spoon, stir gently a couple of times to prevent sticking. Bring to a boil; boil for 3 to 4 minutes or until pierogies rise to the surface. Remove with a slotted spoon, transferring to a bowl of cold water. Repeat with remaining pierogies in batches. Reheat pierogies in microwave or fry in oil or butter in skillet; top with reserved fried onions. Serve with a dollop of sour cream or yogurt.

Ruth's recommendations:

Dough can be made a day ahead. Bring to room temperature before filling. Making extra dough means you can freeze it (form it into a disc and wrap in plastic wrap), ready to make another batch of pierogies another day.

Freeze uncooked pierogies in a single layer on a baking sheet lined with waxed paper. Once frozen, transfer to a freezer bag to store in freezer. To serve, boil as above, then fry in skillet with butter or oil and top with fried onions. Yield: about 36.

Hamas military wing vows revenge for IDF operation

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas' military wing vowed revenge Monday for Israel's assassination of two senior Hamas operatives in the Gaza Strip the night before, Israel Radio reported.

Hamas has threatened to retaliate with rocket attacks and suicide bombings.

Defence sources said the principal target of Sunday's attack, in which they say four Palestinian militants travelling in a car in Gaza City were killed in a missile strike, was Ahmed Shatiwi, a senior member of the Hamas military wing who served as the liaison between Hamas' leadership in Gaza and its cells in the West Bank.

Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin said before dawn Monday that Israel will pay the price for killing Shatiwi, Israel Radio reported.

A second occupant of the car was Walid Alhumas, also a fairly senior Hamas operative. Eyewitnesses said Apache helicopters fired at least three anti-tank missiles at the car and eight bystanders were wounded in the attack.

Israel's security establishment has received an increased number of terrorist threats since last week's assassination of top Hamas official Ismail Abu Shanab, and Islamic Jihad has also threatened revenge, Israel Radio reported.

Defence sources said the targeted killing was aimed at preventing a double suicide attack that Hamas' military wing had planned. The operation took place a few hours after Israel Defence Forces (IDF) chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon announced that Israel views "all Hamas personnel as targets for pinpoint preventions."

Palestinian sources said the other two men killed in the attack were not in the car at all, but were members of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's presidential guard, Force 17, who were guarding a nearby roadblock in front of Arafat's house in Sheikh Ajalin.

Since Israel's assassination of Abu Shanab last Thursday, there have been several intelligence warnings about Hamas and Islamic Jihad plans to retaliate with suicide bombings.

The IDF has received three specific warnings of terror attacks in which the would-be terrorists would come from Nablus, where troops are operating and have imposed a full curfew, Israel Radio reported Monday.

A senior IDF officer said troops in Nablus are digging into walls and pulling up tiles in their search for weapons, the radio reported.

The Palestinian men have left their homes in the Nablus casbah (marketplace), and suspects have left the old city there, according to Israel Radio.

Troops also arrested four wanted Palestinians Sunday night in the Balata refugee camp near Nablus.

The IDF has imposed a full closure on the Gaza Strip, the radio reported. Monday, Palestinians fired from the sea for the first time at IDF outposts in Gush Katif, in Gaza.

The IDF plans to continue its operations in Nablus and perhaps expand to Jenin and Hebron as well, since the Shin Bet says dangerous terror cells are located in those cities. The IDF might also take action against wanted terrorists in Ramallah, where, last week, 18 men wanted by Israel left Arafat's headquarters, and are now scattered in various hiding places in the city.

However, the army will consider easing travel restrictions for Palestinians in Bethlehem, Jericho and Qalqilyah. A senior source at the IDF's Central Command said, "Where we can, we will make things easier for Palestinian citizens."

Mofaz questions PA actions

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Sunday that the Palestinians are not taking any real steps to dismantle the terror infrastructure, and that any action they take is for appearance only, aimed at easing American pressure on the Palestinian Authority (PA).

After consulting with the defence establishment, Mofaz came to that conclusion, adding that recent events prove again that PA President Yasser Arafat is hampering both the peace process and the government of PA Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, and is directly responsible for the deterioration of the recent days.

Mofaz said, however, that the steps taken to ease restrictions on the Palestinian population would be continued, and that the Rafah, Karni and Allenby border terminals would remain open.

Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon said Sunday that senior Hamas officials in Syria and the Gaza Strip were responsible for the suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem last week, in which 21 people were killed, and that "whoever supports such activities will not go unpunished.

"From our perspective all [Hamas] members are part of the radical core." Ya'alon said, noting that the radical terror core is in the Gaza Strip.

"If we see that the Palestinian Authority does not deal with this core, we will be forced to do so," he said.

Ya'alon said there is no doubt that an escalation of tensions is taking place. "The terror organizations are currently trying to carry out deadly terror attacks, and we are taking action to thwart them. The question is whether this is a short-term escalation, or a deterioration that will force us to take massive action."

Palestinian security forces on Saturday night appeared to be taking preliminary steps against the terrorist factions in the Gaza Strip following heavy pressure from the United States on top Palestinian leaders.

The Palestinian Preventive Security Apparatus uncovered four tunnels in the border town of Rafah on Saturday night and Sunday morning. They sealed off the tunnels, used to smuggle weapons and drugs from Egypt into the Gaza Strip. The Palestinian security services also arrested some of the smugglers.

On Sunday, Abdel Razeq Majaideh, the head of the PA's National Security Service, publicly ordered his men to deploy around Beit Hanun to prevent the firing of Qassam rockets into Israel, and in Rafah to prevent the arms smuggling.

Channel One quoted a senior government source as saying the action taken by the Palestinian Authority was "too little, too late."

U.S. might pump oil from Iraq to Haifa

By AMIRAM COHEN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sources in Jerusalem have confirmed the United States has asked Israel to investigate the possibility of pumping oil from Iraq to the oil refineries in Haifa.

The request came in a telegram last week from a senior Pentagon official to a top Foreign Ministry official in Jerusalem.

The Prime Minister's Office, which views the pipeline to Haifa as a "bonus" the United States could give to Israel in return for its unequivocal support for the American-led campaign in Iraq, had asked the Americans for an official telegram.

The new pipeline would take oil from the Kirkuk area, where some 40 per cent of Iraqi oil is produced, and transport it via Mosul, and then across Jordan to Israel. The U.S. telegram included a request for a cost estimate for repairing the Mosul-Haifa pipeline that was in use prior to 1948. During the War of Independence, the Iraqis stopped the flow of oil to Haifa, and the pipeline subsequently fell into disrepair.

South African advocacy group marks 100 years

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

The South African Jewish Board of Deputies (SAJBD) will be celebrating its 100th anniversary with an international meeting of the World Jewish Congress (WJC) in Johannesburg and Cape Town from Sept. 5 to 7.

When SAJBD – the South African equivalent of Canadian Jewish Congress – was founded 100 years ago, it represented an immigrant community that hailed from Eastern Europe. Today, South Africa's Jewish community is "strong and self-sufficient," Yehuda Kay, executive director of the SAJBD, said in a phone interview from Johannesburg.

"We've gone from a community of immigrants to a vital, vibrant part of South Africa," Kay said.

Among the attendees at the centenary will be Martin Luther King III. One of the most pressing issues facing the Jewish community in South Africa is its relations with local black Muslim groups, and hosting a black leader from the United States sends a strong message, said WJC Secretary-General Avi Beker.

> 'We've gone from a community of immigrants to a vital, vibrant part of South Africa'

"It shows blacks in South Africa that the Jews have a very close relationship with blacks," he said from Jerusalem.

Other issues facing the South African community are crime and anti-Israel bias in the media. In response, Kay said, the SAJBD participates in a grassroots, cross-cultural group that looks for ways to fight crime, and has created a professional media team to counter the "ugly" media campaign against Israel.

"Our priority has always been to safeguard the Jewish community's rights, lobbying for protecting Israel from bias in the media and political circles," Kay said. Other top priorities are building relationships with the government and fighting anti-Semitism.

Demographics is another pressing problem for the South African Jewish community. At its height, the community numbered 120,000, but the population has dropped to about 80,000 as its younger members have sought better opportunities abroad.

Beker said many South African Jews abroad become active in their adopted communities.

"[CJC president] Keith Landy is an example of the dispersion of the Jewish community from South Africa," he said.

Landy, who came to Canada from South Africa in 1970 and will be attending the anniversary bash, said many South African Jews left the country after the Soweto race riots – the worst in South Africa's history – in 1976, and after the fall of apartheid in 1994 because of the shaky political situation.

"Nobody knew there was going to be peace and reconciliation under Mandela," Landy said.

That's why there are pockets of South African Jews in English-speaking countries such as Canada and the United States, Britain and Australia, he explained.

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler will also be speaking at the meeting.

Egyptians to sue Jews for Exodus gold

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAIRO — A group of Egyptian jurists are considering suing the Jews for gold the ancient Israelites carried out of Egypt.

Nabil Hilmi, law dean at the University of Al-Zaqziq, told the Egyptian weekly Al-Ahram Al-Arabi that "the statute of limitations cannot possibly apply" in the suit, according to the Middle East Media Research Institute, which translated the Arabic newspaper report.

"This is clear theft of a host country's resources and treasure, something that fits the morals and character of the Jews," Hilmi said.

Gamil Yaken, vice-president of the Egyptian community in Switzerland, is preparing the research for the lawsuit, which is based in part on biblical narrative.

The report did not say whether compensation for Jewish slave labour in Egypt, reported in that same biblical narrative, would be taken in consideration.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 18

• Attorney general Elyakim Rubinstein has named a team to probe a land-expropriation scandal in Kfar Malal surrounding allegations Prime Minster Ariel Sharon influenced compensation levels for the expropriation.

Aug. 19

• Israel announced a major contract to purchase natural gas from Egypt. The government selected Egypt as the supplier rather than a joint British-Palestinian consortium.

Aug. 20

• Seventeen new immigrants from Iraq landed at Ben Gurion Airport. Unlike the six elderly Jews from Iraq brought to Israel at the end of July, this group comprises complete families.

• The army said it had successfully foiled a suicide bombing that Islamic Jihad had planned for Haifa this week. The bomber and two accomplices were arrested the previous day at a military roadblock west of Jenin, but the arrests were only made public afterward.

Aug. 21

• The army was reported to be moving tanks toward Ramallah and Nablus.

• Members of the Hamas military wing in the Gaza Strip fired Qassam rockets at targets in the south of Israel, two of which landed in Sderot and two in an open space on a kibbutz nearby. No one was injured.

Aug. 22

• Several cities, towns and regional councils, as well as most kibbutz and moshav schools, will take part in the experimental five-day school week program in the coming school year, which starts Aug. 31. The move is expected to save the Education Ministry an estimated NIS 80-100 million a year and the local authorities an annual NIS 200 million.

As France bakes in the heat, community struggles to bury dead

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — During a sizzling heatwave in France early this month, Parisian Jewish organizations struggled to cope as unburied corpses waited up to four days for Jewish burial.

According to the Paris Consistoire, the principal organization dealing with the religious needs of the community, the Jewish death rate almost tripled during a record heat wave that began early August and lasted for weeks.

The figures for the 350,000-strong Jewish community in the Paris region mirrored the situation across the capital and in much of France, with reports suggesting that as many as 15,000 people had died in temperatures that reached higher than 45 C.

Jacques B'Chiri, head of the Consistoire burial board, told JTA mid-August the Consistoire was handling around 30 burials a day, considerably higher than the 10 to 15 per-day average for this time of year.

"The situation is very difficult indeed," B'Chiri said. "We have bodies waiting days for burial, and there's nothing we can do about it."

At the Pantin cemetery in northern Paris, the largest in the region that has a sizeable Jewish section, Jewish funeral directors said their companies were conducting burials every 15 minutes.

"Usually there's at least an hour gap between funerals. I've never seen anything like this," said Philippe Hay, a funeral organizer from Benhamou burial services. "People call us and we tell them that they have to wait a minimum of three days."

B'Chiri said hospitals were struggling with the number of bodies in morgues, which were so piled up they couldn't always get to them quickly enough.

"The cold storage morgues in the hospitals are full. The government said it's going to bring in special plastic rooms to hold up to 100 bodies, but we're still waiting for that," he said.

B'Chiri said he was particularly perturbed by the fact that, in many cases, nobody was around to comfort Jewish mourners or even to perform ceremonies.

In mid-August, he said, "The rabbis are all away on holiday, and they haven't left replacements."

Outside Paris, he said, it was "even worse. There's nobody around in Orleans and Tours, and people are dying."

As for the ritual cleansing of the bodies after death, known as taharah, B'Chiri said the Consistoire was coping, "but there's nobody around to say Shema Yisrael or light candles."

He said he was considering calling rabbis back from holiday. "What can you do when the Consistoire itself has practically shut down for the summer?"

Traditionally, Parisians leave the capital in droves during August, heading south or west to the coast.

The Consistoire wasn't the only understaffed organization: An operator at the United Jewish Social Funds, the umbrella welfare and educational organization of French Jews, said, "There's virtually no one here."

At L'Ose Medical, one of the oldest Jewish medical institutions in Paris, a recorded message said the building was closed until Aug. 22.

At CASIP, Paris' Jewish social services group, a spokesperson said the organization had adopted special measures in its old-age homes in Paris and in the southern suburb of Creteil.

Esther Freiberg, director of the CASIP-run Amaragi Home in Paris' 19th district, said that after the heat wave started, all outside trips for residents were cancelled and around-the-clock medical supervision was implemented for the 80 residents.

"We made sure that everyone drank mineral water or sodas every 20 minutes or so, to make sure that body liquids and salts were kept up," Freiberg said. "Thank God there were no mortalities."

In general, the Jewish community in the capital was better off than the majority of the population, never getting to the point that bodies couldn't be transported from homes to hospital morgues. The community had enough vehicles to cope with the extra demand, Consistoire officials said.

Hardest hit were the elderly and people with serious medical conditions exacerbated by the scorching temperatures.

While government statistics showed that many had died at home, the situation in Paris hospitals and centres for the aged also was poor.

With little experience in dealing with such a heat wave – the hottest and most prolonged in France in more than 100 years – many institutions lacked the necessary cooling facilities.

A good deal of criticism was directed at the government, with a number of doctors' unions saying ministers had done too little, too late.

But some of the major Jewish institutions did not wait for government guidelines to arrive.

With more than 500 residents, the Rothschild Foundation Home for the Aged and Geriatric Centre in central Paris, one of the largest non-profit institutions of its kind in France, began implementing emergency procedures on Aug. 4, a week before Ministry of Health guidelines arrived.

According to the centre's director, Jean-Marie Descamps, these procedures pushed off a large increase in mortalities until Aug. 11 and 12 – the hottest two days, when temperatures reached 42 C (107 F) in the shade and close to 49 C (120 F) in the sun.

Just as problematic, the heat wave intensified as it continued, and certain areas of the building never truly cooled down.

Descamps said he was not permitted to divulge exact mortality figures for the centre, but he said there had been "a very high rise, with many more deaths than is usual for this time of the year."

"Even if there are no more deaths from now until the end of the month, there will have still been more than in the whole month of August 2001," Descamps said, adding that the summer of 2001 had also been particularly warm.

"Here, where we also have a medical centre with around 80 beds, the average age is about 85 and many people have serious medical problems, which means they find it hard to reduce their body temperatures," he said.

"We have, though, been able to combat problems of dehydration, and we go around the building all the time insisting that people drink. Thankfully, no one has died of dehydration."

The Rothschild centre is not air-conditioned because it could be dangerous for such an institution, Descamps said. Staff had been told to apply wet towels and increase showers to residents during the heat wave.

Yet that also had presented problems, Descamps said: Being forced to take more frequent showers during the heat wave "was not easy for those who came through the Shoah."

Mortality rates steadied as temperatures fell to more comfortable levels by the end of the second week of August, Descamps said.

Iranian arrested for 1994 Argentinia attack

In March 1992, a blast destroyed the Israeli Embassy, killing 29 people.

Jewish leaders have criticized Argentine authorities for failing to apprehend those responsible for either attack.

Iran's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Hamid Reza Asefi, has rejected allegations of Iranian involvement in the bombing, but Galeano said in a 400-page document to Interpol he considers beyond question that "radical elements of the Islamic Republic of Iran" were responsible.

Galeano did not directly blame the Iranian government but claimed that Moshen Rabbani, former cultural attaché in the Iranian Embassy in Buenos Aires, was a "key element in the organized group" that staged the attack.

The arrest has sparked anger in the Iranian press and Iran's state television said Sunday it is cutting its cultural and economic ties with Argentina.

"Iran's Foreign Ministry official in charge of the Americas desk announced Iran's strong objection to the Argentine judiciary's measure and informed him [the Argentine charge d'affaires] of Iran's decision on halting cultural and economic cooperation with Argentina," state television quoted Foreign Ministry official Mehdi Mohtashami as saying.

Officials at the Argentine mission in Tehran were not immediately available for comment. One western diplomat said Argentina had a charge d'affaires in Tehran. Iranian Foreign Ministry officials were also not available.

Iran is a major wheat importer and Argentina has traditionally been among the country's suppliers. It was not immediately clear whether that trade would be affected by the move.

Tehran previously withdrew its ambassador from Argentina to protest against the claim of Iranian involvement, though it retains a mission in Buenos Aires.

One diplomat in Tehran said the Iranian move suggested the government wanted to express anger at the former diplomat's arrest, but was stopping short of a major new diplomatic initiative against Argentina.

Britain's charge d'affaires in Tehran, Matthew Gould, reportedly told Iranian Foreign Ministry officials Soleimanpour's arrest was not politically motivated, and the court's decision was independent of the British government.

"The British government cannot interfere at this stage of the extradition process," he said, adding that he had been summoned to the Iranian Foreign Ministry and asked for the immediate release of the former diplomat.

Names in the News: Toronto Yiddish translator Miriam Beckerman is preparing to make a presentation at the International Association of Yiddish Clubs conference this coming week in Baltimore, Md. The conference runs Sept. 4 thru 7 and its theme is "Yiddish Teachers, Heroes Then and Now."

Beckerman, whose many translation credits include the English rendering of author Dovid Katz's book Misnagdishe Meyses (Tales of the Mitnagdim), plans to speak on the topic, "My Teacher Dovid Katz." She studied with the well-known writer-journalist and founder of Oxford University's Yiddish studies program during a summer course she attended at Vilnius University in Lithuania in 1998.

A native Torontonian who lived in Israel from 1947 to 1952 before returning here, Beckerman started translating as a hobby, but began taking it more seriously after attending a conference at the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass., in 1990. Since then she has translated a growing list of Holocaust memoirs and yizkor (remembrance) books. "I get requests for translations from all over," she said.

Recently translated titles include Nightmares: Memoirs of the Years of Horror Under Nazi Rule in Europe, 1939-1945, by Conrad Charmatz, soon to be released in translation by Syracuse University Press. Another is Hafiling (Prisoner) No. 94771: Memoirs of Nazi Concentration Camps, by Paula Frankel-Zaltzman, which Beckerman describes as "one of the very first Holocaust memoirs, published in Montreal in 1949."

She expects to read a translated excerpt from Charmatz's book at Israel's Judaica soon after its publication, probably this fall.

Buddies star in CBC comedy Kenny vs. Spenny

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Kenny Hotz and Spencer Rice, two old friends who grew up in Toronto, are betting their madcap antics will endear them to a loyal, abiding audience.

They are the creators, directors and stars of Kenny vs. Spenny, a new CBC television sitcom that debuts Tuesday, Sept. 2, at 5:30 p.m., after The Simpsons.

The show, which unfolds in 26 half-hour segments, is basically directed at teenagers. But Hotz and Rice are hopeful adults will like it as well.

"Even ex-Nazis in Brazil," Hotz quipped.

Kenny vs. Spenny, produced by a team consisting of Ira Levy, Peter Williamson, John Morayniss and Noreen Halpern, is still in production, but 19 episodes are already in the can.

It turns on the relationship – and rivalry – between two regular, though wacky, guys who try to outsmart or sabotage each other while competing in outrageous contests.

Who can stay awake the longest? Who is the handsomest guy on the block? Who can lose the most weight in an allotted period of time?

According to the rules of the game, the loser of the competition is called on to perform a humiliating task, said Rice, who met Hotz at Forest Hill Collegiate in 1982 and began working with him professionally in 1989.

Hotz compares their humour to the fabled hijinks of Laurel and Hardy, while Rice describes their jokey routines as a "slapstick, jackass type of comedy."

In terms of their on-screen personas, the two are night and day. Spenny plays the straight man and Kenny portrays a schemer.

"The show works because we're very different," said Rice.

Hotz, a student at Beth Tzedec's United Synagogue Day School until Grade 8, graduated from Ryerson's media arts program. Rice studied film at York University.

Hotz, the son of Jack and Tzafi, attributes his bent for zany humour to his older brother, Ron, a physician ("the butcher of Bathurst," Kenny calls him) who writes on the side; his sister Miriam, a nutritionist, and his late father, "a classic joke teller."

Rice, whose father Vincent died recently, said he was drawn to the entertainment business by his mother, Corinne, who once dated an actor from Dallas ("Sue Ellen's psychiatrist.")

Shortly after forming a writing partnership with Rice, Hotz went to Israel to cover the 1991 Gulf War as a photographer.

Fluent in Hebrew thanks to his kibbutz-born and bred mother, he obtained press credentials with the help of his uncle, Yoel Gillat, an Israeli diplomat who has been stationed in France and China.

Hotz's photographs, which have been exhibited at several Canadian museums, presented a country under siege.

From the roof of the Hilton Hotel, he remembers watching Iraqi Scud missiles landing in Tel Aviv.

Since the late 1980s, he and Rice have collaborated on several projects.

One of their first, a comedy feature, was The Last Days of Toronto.

"It was a terrible movie," recalled Hotz. "You have to make bad movies before you can make good ones."

It was followed by The Gordy Movie, a film about a homeless hobo from Toronto who happens to be a dwarf.

Later, they wrote a script for an episode of Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles.

Pitch, shot at the Toronto International Film Festival, was next. It chronicles their frantic attempt to sell a movie script to the powers-that-be. It won the best film award at the 1998 Toronto Independent Arts Festival.

The duo developed Kenny vs. Spenny during an eye-opening, hand-to-mouth stint living in Los Angeles from 1999 to 2002.

"I lived on Kraft dinners," said Hotz tersely. "It was crazy."

"Los Angeles exceeded my expectation for being phony," observed Rice. "All the stuff you hear about Hollywood is true."

Hotz and Rice believe, or at least they hope, that Kenny vs. Spenny has a bright future.

"You never know in this business, but I think it will be huge," said Hotz. "We're very lucky, because good stuff is not always produced."

'Johnny' retraces footsteps in Charlie at the Fair

The Canadian National Exhibition, one of North America's largest annual fairs, celebrates its 125th anniversary this year, and has special activities for people of all ages.

In addition to the festival's main attractions Kids World and Kids Science, the International Pavilion Main Stage, the Food Building and the Midway, this year's CNE will have nightly fireworks and a name change for the 55 and Better Pavilion to Remember When…

As their parents enjoy the nostalgia, their children and grandchildren will be treated to a bit of Toronto's history.

Fifty-six years ago, a four-year-old boy and his parents were featured in a National Film Board movie, Johnny at the Fair, which celebrated the reopening of the CNE – it closed in 1941 for six years because of World War II – and which was meant to boost the morale of Canadians.

The young boy in the movie, Charlie Pachter, is now 60 years old and a renowned Canadian artist. His mother, Sara Pachter, 88, a Toronto tour guide, played his mother in the original movie. Pachter, who says his appearance in Johnny set him on his path as an artist, has retraced his footsteps at the CNE in Charlie at the Fair, a 15-minute documentary about the making of Johnny at the Fair.

Charlie at the Fair, directed by Paul Castel-Andrew, includes never-before-seen footage from the original film. Narrated by Lorne Green, the original movie told the tale of a young boy who is bored seeing what his parents want him to see at the CNE. He breaks away and goes wandering on his own.

On his wanderings, he meets with a host of characters – celebrities who make cameo appearances – including then-prime minister Mackenzie King who opens the fair, figure skating champion Barbara Ann Scott, boxing legend Joe Louis and entertainers John Olsen and Harold Johnson.

Charlie at the Fair is the brainchild of Bob Pomerantz, a video producer who is on the CNE board and serves at the chair of the programs committee.

Pomerantz said he was delighted his video company, Your Life Productions, produced Charlie. (Sydney Newman produced Johnny at the Fair.)

"I became friends with Charlie Pachter, a really funny and charming guy," he says. "After three months of searching, we tracked down Jack Olson, 86, who directed the original movie. Charlie, a cameraman and I went to visit and interview him where he lives on top of a mountain two hours outside of Rome."

In Charlie, Olsen tells Pachter he is glad they found him. "It makes my heart strong," Olsen says.

Pomeranz says producing the documentary was a labour of love.

"In 27 years, I have never missed going to the Ex. It is a ritual to go with my brother. I always loved the CNE. I worked there as a teenager selling balloons and stuffed animals. When I worked at the [Toronto] Star, one summer I covered the Ex every day."

Pomerantz was a reporter, columnist and editor at the Star for eight years before opening his own business.

The original score for Johnny at the Fair was written by Eldon Rathburn, now 88, and violinist and conductor Eugene Kash, 91, who conducted the Toronto Symphony Orchestra musicians. Both Rathburn and Kash appear in the documentary.

The re-released Johnny at the Fair and Charlie at the Fair are being screened six times each day at CNE's National Trade Centre's theatre. Visit [www.theex.com] or e-mail info@theex.com.

The sound of Israeli music

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Like music that comes from everywhere else in the world, Israeli music cannot be defined by one genre. Israel boasts dynamic music in all genres: rock, pop, punk, jazz, hip-hop, alternative, electronic, classical, Mediterranean and folk.

Here is a list of what's hot in Israeli music today.

Dana Berger: In Motion (Toch Kday Tnua): (NMC)

In Motion is the recently released second album of the queen of Israeli rock and pop. It's a solid collection that deserves recognition in its own right, though it comes on the heels of the groundbreaking success of her previous disc, the 2000 release Up to the Edge (Ad Hakatzeh).

Up to the Edge was awarded the Israeli rock industry's highest honour, the Tammuz Award for Album of the Year. It put Berger in the top slot as rock goddess. She maintains the title, but the singles from In Motion are taking longer to rise to the top of the charts than her singles of three years ago.

Berger, 32, broke into the music scene nearly a decade ago. Her early music showed influences from David Bowie and Pink Floyd and electronic and hard-core techno. Today, she's inspired by Zero-7 and Massive Attack. The title track of In Motion continues to rely on the heavy computer loops that were used on Ad Hakatzeh, while the songs Butterfly and Come and Go lean towards a more lounge-room style. Love in Summer mixes both approaches.

In Motion is a suitable title, considering Berger put the album together while pregnant, released it in February, gave birth in March and began touring in May to promote it. This album marks her second collaboration with songwriter Meir Goldberg and producer Ofer Meiri. The resulting 11 tracks are strong. They are the backbone of local radio, while her videos dominate the all-Israeli music television channel.

Pollyanna Frank: Plastelina 1 (NMC)

Plastelina 1 is a diverse collection of 10 Israeli hits from the last 30 years. It is the first in a series put out by record label NMC, which gets local artists to revise classic recordings. The first group to participate in this project is Pollyanna Frank, a progressive rock duo made up of Sharon (Ellyott Dragon) Ben-Ezer and Chaim (Frank) Ilfman.

Pollyanna Frank – they take their name from Ben-Ezer's favourite books, Pollyanna and The Diary of Anne Frank – are successful in their unconventional remixes. They have given traditional folksy songs such as Hedva Amrani's I Dream of Naomi and Chava Alberstein's Nuebba a new electronic, trip-hop twist. Although unorthodox, the genre mixing works. The disc also contains the successfully re-jigged Learning to Fly (Dana Berger) and Arik (Shlomi Shaban), which didn't really need reinterpreting, but nonetheless benefit from these fresh covers.

Other artists covered on the disc include Gali Atari, Arik Lavie, Shalom Hanoch, Knessiat Hasechel, Yehudit Ravitz and Meir Banai. Ilfman was the composer of the soundtrack for last year's powerful Canadian drama Savage Messiah. He and Ben-Ezer met in 1991 when they combined forces on a song for the film, Intruder. Ben-Ezer also played in the band Sister George and still gigs with the Dutch group Nightnurse.

The album is classified as rock but in fact fuses rock, pop, dance and electronic beats.

One-day festival showcases work of Pomegranate Guild

A one-day textile art festival at the Toby and Henry Battle Development Centre showcases the work of the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles members.

It features continuous demonstrations of different techniques and materials and there will be a sale of hand made articles created by the guild members and other artisans.

Among the Judaica items are challah and matzah covers, mezuzot, beaded items including a megillah case, quilts with Judaica, sukkah banners, chupahs and other Judaica items.

Sarita Frasko, a past president of the Pomegranate Guild and the co-chair of the Art Festival with Ruth Smith, said she became a member of the guild 10 years ago when she attended a Pomegranate exhibition and sale.

"I was always interested in hand work and when I saw the work of the members, I decided to join. Being part of this group enhances and challenges our art to a higher level."

Elaine Genesove was recently elected president. Frasko says that the Pomegranate Guild, which was founded in 1982, has 100 members.

They meet monthly at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue where a program is presented on some aspect of beading, embroidering, textiles and hand work of all kinds. "Some sessions are hands-on and we learn many new techniques," says Frasko.

A small group of members meets weekly to work on either individual or group projects, some of which are donated to local institutions and synagogues such as the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"It doesn't matter what affiliation you have," says Frasko, "we all come together as Jewish women with a common interest.

The guild's Jewish Textile Art Festival is free and takes place Sept. 14 from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the Toby and Henry Battle Development Centre (Reena Foundation), 927 Clarke Ave. W. in Thornhill. The building is wheelchair accessible. For more information visit their website www.pomegranateguild.ca or call 416-789-1145.

Israeli singer Sharon Azarya is headed for the big time

The NMC Plastelina series has a bright future if the label enlists other musicians as talented as Pollyanna Frank.

Sharon Azarya: Now is the Time (Achshav Zeh Hazman) (Self-produced)

Sharon Azarya is the new kid on the block. Although she has been singing since she was six years old, the 29-year-old singer just released her debut album in August. Now is the Time, the CD's title track, is currently a fixture on Israeli radio waves. Azarya's rendition of Ehud Manor's Beraysheet (In the Beginning) is also a big hit.

Even if you cannot understand her Hebrew lyrics, Azarya's low, jazz-inflected voice is sure to seduce you. Her sexy vocals can best be described as a cross between Sade and Tanita Tikaram.

Her songs combine an eclectic range of musical influences. There's No End has elements of traditional Jewish liturgical sounds mixed into its melody, while Come Wind emanates classical Indian music Azarya must have brought back with her from voice coaching in Varanassi.

Azarya and a musician named Giga, who is responsible for all the album's instruments, put the record together in Giga's low-key home studio in northern Israel.

Azarya opted against signing with a bigger label so as to keep control of her style and work. The outcome is remarkable. All 11 tracks on this disc are noteworthy. People who visit Israel in the autumn will have a chance to catch her live on the Rosh Hashanah festival circuit. Those who can't travel here are recommended to make this CD their next investment. Azarya is heading for the big time.

Music can be bought at www.israel-music.com (English site); www.mooma.com (Hebrew site); and www.nmc-music.co.il (Hebrew and English site).

Toronto alumna first female president of Frat

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dentist Sharon Perlmutter is the first female president of the Toronto alumni chapter of Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity, and the first second-generation president.

Her father, Dr. Gordon Perlmutter, also served as Toronto president, and was president of International Alpha Omega in 1983.

At her recent installation at a grand ball at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Perlmutter said she was proud to be following in her father's footsteps.

Perlmutter graduated in Middle Eastern studies at the University of Toronto and studied at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. After working as a dental assistant, she returned to school and graduated in dentistry at the State University of New York at Buffalo, 15 years ago.

She spent a year in general practice residency at Michael Reese Hospital in Chicago and then returned to Toronto to join her father in his practice. He retired last year and she has remained at the same location.

"Alpha Omega has been an integral part of my life," Perlmutter says. "My father has shown me by example to strive to be honest, hardworking, dedicated and generous. He and my mother, who has also been very active in Alpha Omega and in the community, instilled in me the importance of these qualities in all aspects of my life."

These are the tools, she says, that she plans to use to contribute to the success of the Toronto chapter. "We must continue to give back to the community both professionally and socially."

In addition to the dental projects of the Toronto organization, she stressed the importance of supporting community projects, "like our participation in the UJA Walk for Israel and projects such as the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Students at U of T [which advocates on behalf of Israel], and local charities and hospitals."

She chaired the United Jewish Appeal dental division for two years, and last May, she co-chaired the first UJA Alpha Omega Israel mission. She has twice served as a volunteer dentist for Dental Volunteers for Israel in Jerusalem, which treats underprivileged children.

She emphasized the need for her female colleagues to stay involved and seek leadership positions at Alpha Omega. "I am very proud to be the first female president of AO. It is unfortunate that it has taken so long. I hope I can inspire more females to become involved."

Perlmutter still finds time to ski and travel; she has been to Israel three times in the last year.

As well, she is active in Alpha Omega International and attends their dental conventions, "something I have been doing with my father and family since I was a child."

New vaccine for colorectal cancer patients

A new vaccine to treat colorectal cancer may help cells from the patient's own body kill the cancer cells.

A trial for the new vaccine has begun enrolling patients at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) and several other sites across Canada. It will enrol patients with Stage III colorectal cancer (tumours that have spread to several layers of the colon, or that have spread to lymph nodes) who have not yet been treated with standard chemotherapy.

Dr. Gerald Batist, an oncologist at JGH, is the principal investigator for the study. He is the director of the Montreal Centre for Experimental Therapeutics in Cancer and the McGill Centre for Translational Research in Cancer, both of which are based at JGH.

"The goal of the study is to determine if the vaccine, called ALVAC-CEA/B7.1, can activate the body's own immune system to eliminate cancer cells that may not be eliminated with traditional treatment of colorectal cancer with the standard, first-line chemotherapy regimen," Batist says. "We will be looking to see if the vaccine, combined with chemotherapy, allows a better outcome for patients than chemotherapy alone."

The trial is investigating the new vaccine administered at the same time as standard chemotherapy regimen 5-flurouracil and leucocorin or following chemotherapy. Sixty patients with Stage III colon cancer will be placed into one of two treatment arms.

One study group will receive one vaccination before starting chemotherapy, followed by three weekly doses during the first cycle of chemotherapy, then one vaccination with each chemotherapy cycle (up to six cycles), and vaccinations every two months for up to one year.

The second group will receive four vaccinations during the first month after completing chemotherapy, and one vaccine dose per month for another five months.

Patients will be evaluated immediately following treatment and at each follow-up visit.

The vaccine under investigation and other ALVAC-based formulations have shown promise in early clinical studies conducted by the U.S. National Cancer Institute, in collaboration with Therion Biologics of Cambridge, Mass. They are safe, with a non-overlapping toxicity profile to chemotherapy. In general, treatments were well-tolerated, with no significant product-related toxicities. Side effects associated with the vaccine included mild, local reactions.

Typically, vaccines are designed to prevent diseases by preparing the immune system for a possible attack. With therapeutic cancer vaccine, the goal is to "turn on" the immune system of people who already have the disease, to increase the power of current treatments such as chemotherapy.

Colorectal cancer is the second leading cause of cancer-related deaths in Canada and the most common cancer in the gastrointenstinal tract. There are more than 17,000 new cases diagnosed and 6,500 deaths in the country each year. An estimated 70 per cent of patients are initially diagnosed with treatable forms of the disease, but 25 per cent of these patients experience recurrence, which frequently leads to death due to the cancer spreading beyond the original site.

The Jewish General Hospital is an acute care, McGill University teaching hospital with 637 beds, serving patients from across the province of Quebec.

Aventis Pasteur Limited of Toronto is sponsoring the vaccine study. For more information about eligibility, individuals should contact Batist at the JGH's oncology department at 514-340-8248.

Book uses declassified documents to detail Nazi settlement in Argentina

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nestor Kirchner, the newly installed president of Argentina, met recently with officials of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Washington, D.C. One of the topics under discussion was the immigration of Nazi war criminals to Argentina after World War II.

In a significant gesture, Kirchner promised to declassify documents on Nazis who had settled in Argentina.

Beginning in 1946, while Juan Peron was president, a procession of major and minor Nazis turned up in Argentina, home to the largest Jewish community in Latin America.

Among these scoundrels were Adolf Eichmann, the facilitator of the Holocaust in Hungary; Ante Pavelic, the Nazi fuhrer in Croatia; and Josef Mengele, the SS Auschwitz doctor whose gruesome medical experiments still chill the imagination.

Uki Goni, a seasoned Buenos Aires-based journalist, has written an intriguing, though occasionally plodding, book about this touchy subject.

The Real Odessa, published by Granta Publications, comes off as an indictment of Peron, who opened up his country to this filth, and of the Roman Catholic church in Argentina, which helped Nazis escape from Europe.

It's not a pretty picture, but Goni does not flinch from exposing Argentina's complicity in the resettlement of Nazi murderers in Argentina.

Neither is he loath to contrast Peron's welcoming of Nazi immigrants with Argentina's pre-war anti-Semitic immigration policy, the subject of the book's opening pages.

On July 12, 1938, Argentina's foreign minister signed a secret document, known as Directive 11, that was wired to Argentina's embassies around the world. Designed to deny visas to German and Austrian Jews, it was followed by yet more secret decrees restricting Jewish immigration.

These directives had the desired effect: the number of Jewish immigrants plummeted from 4,919 in 1938 to 1,873 in 1939.

Due to corruption in the ranks of Argentina's foreign ministry, however, 20,000 to 30,000 European Jews managed to enter Argentina between 1933 and 1945. (The figure for Canada during the same period was 5,000).

Highly susceptible to bribes, Argentine diplomats sold visas to Jews fleeing persecution or the threat thereof. Peron, who assumed office in 1946, knew about this illegal traffic in Jewish refugees and profited from it.

Goni notes that Peron, who was something of an anti-Semite himself, reappointed Santiago Peralta, a notorious Jew baiter, to head up the immigration department.

Peralta was the author of two inflammatory works, The Action of the Jewish People in Argentina, which Goni describes as "perhaps the most violent anti-Semitic tract ever published in Argentina," and The Influence of the Arab People in Argentina, which contrasted the benefits of promoting Arab immigration against the disadvantages of admitting Jews.

Under pressure, Peron dismissed Peralta in 1947. But he let Nazis into Argentina.

The Nazi exodus was masterminded by an SS captain named Carlos Fuldner, an ethnic German born in Argentina and raised in Germany.

He was assisted by, among others, Charles Lesca, a French national who was born in Argentina and edited an anti-Semitic magazine.

There was also a Swiss connection. So-called German "technicians," who had been Nazis, were clandestinely funnelled into Argentina from Switzerland with the explicit knowledge of Swiss sympathizers.

In some cases, the Nazis arrived disguised as priests. Their passage to South America was supported by Eugene Tisserant, a French cardinal assigned to the Vatican, and Antonio Caggiano, an Argentine cardinal.

Peron tolerated the presence of Nazis in Argentina because of his peculiar mindset.

Toward the end of his life, he dictated his memoirs to a cassette recorder, voicing outrage over the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes trials, which he called "a disgrace, unworthy of the victors" and "an outrage history will not forgive."

Is it any wonder Peron welcomed Nazis to Argentina?

Israel's Pistolesi relies on hustle, drive and heart

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

Winning two tennis tournaments in a row should have made it easy for Israeli tennis star Anna Pistolesi to play against her top rivals at the recent Rogers AT&T Cup, held Aug. 9 to Aug. 17 at the National Tennis Centre at York University.

The problem was, however, that Pistolesi had recently won her last two tournaments in Poland and Finland on clay, far removed from the hard courts in Toronto.

She was forced to withdraw from the Toronto event, because she was unable to endure a long flight from Helsinki to Toronto and be ready to play hard-court tennis less than 48 hours after winning her tournament in Finland.

"We would have loved to have Anna here and have Torontonians witness her great skills. Pistolesi is ranked 23rd on the WTA pro tour and we were not able to give her a bye into the second round [which is reserved for only the top eight players on the women's professional tennis circuit]," said Stacey Allaster, tournament director of the Rogers AT&T Cup. "There was just not enough time for her to come here from Helsinki."

Pistolesi is Israel's top female player ever to play pro tennis, and is currently the best Jewish player on the planet, despite being only 5-2. Even when she was an up-and-coming junior tennis player, many coaches felt Pistolesi was too short to have a career in professional tennis.

But Pistolesi's game is based on hustle, drive, speed, and heart. And speaking of heart, the former Anna Smashnova married her coach Claudio Pistolesi (who played for Italy in Davis Cup a decade ago) in 2002, and their partnership in love and tennis has been a boost for Anna's career. Since meeting Claudio in 2001, her ranking went through the roof from just under 100 as recently as 1999 to 23 today.

Anna Pistolesi (formerly Smashnova) poses with the trophy she received for winning a tournament in Auckland, New Zealand in early 2002.

Hustle and heart have brought Pistolesi her best success over the past two years after 11 years on the pro tennis circuit. Outside of Serena and Venus Williams, Pistolesi won more tournaments in 2002 – four – than any other woman on the pro circuit.

Her record in tournament finals is a perfect 8-0, and her eight titles are more than any Israeli, male or female, has ever won in tennis.

Pistolesi is second all-time among Jewish female tennis players only to American Julie Heldman, who won 20 tournaments from 1963 to 1974.

"I am not surprised by Anna's success," said Kim Clijsters, the number 1-ranked player in the world and the top seed at the Rogers AT&T Cup.

"She runs you around and hits everything back at you. She rarely makes unforced errors. If you are a power player and think she can be intimidated, watch out. I can only beat her if I am on the very top of my game," Clijsters added.

Pistolesi comes from the former Soviet Union, which was overtly anti-Semitic and forbade the practise of Judaism.

Born in Minsk (now in Belarus) in 1976, young Anna took to tennis when she was six. Before long, she was regularly beating girls three or four years older than her. By age 12, Pistolesi was number 1 in the girls 13 division in the Soviet Union and was beating top girls who were 16.

Despite these achievements, Pistolesi and her family knew it was time to leave the Soviet Union in 1990. "I never felt discrimination in Russia because I am Jewish. The only restriction I had was that I was not able to travel away from the country, like the other players I knew," she said.

However, her parents felt the regime's wrath. Sasha and Zina Smashnova (both engineers) were denied privileges and were forced to sit in the back of the bus on their way to work.

By March,1990, the Smashnovas were able to take advantage of relaxed Soviet Jewish emigration laws and settled in Tel Aviv before moving to Herzliyah. Sasha and Zina found jobs in engineering and Anna's brother Ura became a software analyst.

Anna represented Israel in tennis and won the Junior French Open in 1991 – the first Israeli ever to do so and the youngest at 14 to win it since American Jennifer Capriati won at age 13 in 1989.

Pistolesi learned about being Jewish as a result of her travels in junior tennis, when Israeli youngsters were housed by Jewish families around the world.

"I saw the mother lighting candles on a Friday night and asked 'What is this?' Watching these families doing rituals helped me learn a lot about Judaism," said Pistolesi.

Ongoing terrorist attacks in Israel don't faze Pistolesi. To her, the present and future is better than her past in the Soviet Union.

"I'm not really thinking about the events back home. It is politics. This is sports. It's two different things."

She says part of her newfound success can be attributed to a change in her on-court attitude.

"I used to worry – the coach, the parents – if I win or lose, what will they say? I'm not thinking about anything or anybody now. I decided last year that I just want to play for myself and not really think about what people will think if I win or lose."

Being part of a couple has also helped.

"Everything is different because I'm very happy in my life with Claudio. I've got a lot of confidence."

Fans will see Pistolesi compete next at the U.S. Open in September.

NEW REXALL TENNIS CENTRE

Next year, the new $45 million Rexall Tennis Centre at York University will house the men's Tennis Masters Series event in Toronto, thanks to a partnership with Tennis Canada, the federal and provincial governments, and Katz Group Canada.

"Our core business of health and wellness made it a must to associate ourselves with the new tennis centre," said Larry Latowsky, president of the Katz Group.

Latowsky is a Torontonian and an avid tennis player who has met Israeli tennis players Shlomo Glickstein and Amos Mansdorf through his friendship with tennis player Wotek Fibak of Poland.

DANCING BETWEEN MATCHES

Twin sisters Marnie and Rena Schwartz of Thornhill had tennis fans dancing between the matches thanks to the energy of the Tennis Canada "Racquettes" junior (ages 7-10) and senior (ages 11-16) dance teams.

The 26-year-old twins picked the 29 members of their teams from their dance studio, Vibe Dance and Fitness Studio, which they co-own.

The sisters are past members of both the Toronto Argonauts and Toronto Raptors dance teams. Their teams performed to jazz, hip hop and tap, and performed on-court acrobatics.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

I recently went to my camp reunion. My summers at camp, the last being more than 15 years ago, had a huge influence on my life and definitely helped shape the person I am today. That's because the camp I attended, Camp Shomria, is much more than your average summer camp. It is affiliated with the left-wing Zionist youth movement Hashomer Hatzair and teaches Israeli traditions, history and culture in a socialist kibbutz-style setting.

Throughout the summer, we, as chanichim (campers), would strengthen our Jewish identity by learning about our traditions and culture. Every Friday night, we had Shabbat dinners, shira (singing) and rikud (Israeli dancing).

Jewish youth movements such as Hashomer Hatzair are crucial to the community because many Jewish youth are second- or third-generation Canadians and it is difficult for them to connect to their Jewish roots. Camp marked the first time I was exposed to a Judaism that I enjoyed, and it was where I first accepted Judaism and began forming my Jewish identity.

As a rebellious teenager, I left private school at the first opportunity, and I almost didn't have a bat mitzvah (to my parents' horror). But because of my camp experiences, I made a conscious decision to learn about my Jewish heritage and to participate in year-round activities with other Jewish youth. It was what brought me back to Judaism and kept me there. I slowly learned to struggle against the tide and not just to go with the flow like many Canadian teenagers who don't know their culture and history.

This struggle continues to play a major role in my life today. I realized that it is important for adults to have a strong moral/ethical background and there is nothing stronger than Judaism. As a 30-something woman, I have made many tough decisions and have taken the road less travelled. I am continually faced with issues of integrity and compromise and so are many of my peers. Developing a strong moral foundation in our youth helps us make decisions as adults.

I credit ideas I learned at camp with giving me that strong foundation. All my memories and the things I learned during my years at camp came flooding back as I stood at mifkad (assembly) during the reunion. As I watched the Israeli flag being raised, I felt a complete connection to my Jewish heritage, and I sang Hatikvah with the youth of today and the camp alumni of yesterday. I was able to reflect back on my own search for truth over the years and realize that the past can inspire the future. As we say at Hashomer Hatzair, chazak ve'amatz (strength and courage).

Optimism helps us meet our challenges

Editorial

Jewish people tend to be very optimistic. Why else would we be so certain that if we assure everyone we are sincere in our desire to have peace in Israel, other nations and peoples will accept this and become our partners?

Why else would we be certain that if we become acculturated, joining the rest of the population in watching Survivor, playing squash and dissing the Leafs, Jays and Raptors, they would stop trying to convince us to also accept their saviour as our own?

Furthermore, we maintain our optimism time after time, no matter how often we are proven wrong.

Like 50 million others in Ontario and the northeastern United States, we have now lived through the great blackout of 2003. Some of us did it with bad temper, some with a certain excitement and others with typical Canadian patience.

A wedding in Thornhill went on – even without lights – with the help of a myriad of candles, strolling musicians and much good will.

And, in what felt like a gathering of most of the Jewish community in Sobey's aisles in Thornhill, the atmosphere resonated with swapped horror stories of too much heat and too little water, and the greetings of friends and relations from all over the city.

This supplement, with articles written largely before the blackout, reflects what else is going on in our community.

As is often the case, questions of kashrut remain interesting, even to those for whom it is a mainly academic concern. What is kosher? What relationship is there between the technical aspects of kashrut and the moral and philosophical stances of different rabbinic authorities and sources? And where can you get a really good kosher doughnut?

Toronto continues to be a magnet for immigrants, most recently those from Argentina. We salute their courage in starting a new life in a strange land, with strange customs and a stranger language. They join the great majority of us who either did the same thing or followed close ancestors who did. The Argentine immigrants, too, will help build not only our own community but also the wider community.

At the same time, we note the contributions of some special individuals who may not have changed the world, but in their own way, cast a giant shadow.

Our sages tell us Kol Yisroel areivim zeh lazeh – all the people of Israel are responsible one for the other. What is important to one is by definition important to all of us. By accepting that, and by acting on it, we will get through our challenges and flourish.

A walk through Jewish Toronto of decades past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Smack dab in the middle of teeming Kensington Market, where Cantonese supplanted Yiddish as the language of commerce seemingly eons ago, the Romanesque Anshei Minsk Synagogue stands at 10 St. Andrews St., a stolid sentinel of the past.

Still very much a functioning shul, Anshei Minsk is a historic building, a symbol of a vanished era when the centre of gravity of Toronto's Jewish community was in today's Chinatown.

And so it was fitting that a walk in old Jewish Toronto, sponsored by the Downtown Jewish Learning Council and led by Cyrel Troster, began at the synagogue, which is flanked by a Chinese meat shop and a housewares store.

The 1½-hour tour, which took place on a sunny Sunday morning in the third week of June, attracted about 50 curious people, myself included, eager to learn about Jewish Toronto of yesteryear.

And as an ex-Montrealer, I was particularly interested in learning more about the city that has been my home since 1974.

When Anshei Minsk Synagogue opened in 1930, after eight years of on-again, off-again construction, the neighbourhood in and around Kensington Market was one of Canada's closest approximations to a European Jewish shtetl.

Nowadays, however, it is largely the preserve of Chinese, Portuguese, Vietnamese and, most recently, Somali immigrants.

Other newcomers replaced Jews in Kensington

With its butchers, bakers and merchants catering to all manner of tastes, Kensington Market was a mecca for Jewish immigrants.

They had originally settled in St. John's Ward, further to the south, but by the second decade of the 20th century, the Kensington area was where newly arrived Jews resided and worked.

According to J.B. Salsberg, the late labour leader, politician and newspaper columnist, scores of shuls and prayer houses sprang up to serve the religious needs of Kensington's Jews.

But in 2003, the Jewish presence in Kensington is virtually extinct. All that remains is the Anshei Minsk Synagogue, which is still recovering from last year's arson incident.

The shul, whose creamy walls are graced by murals of gentle wild beasts in repose, faces the Bright Pearl Seafood Restaurant, whose outsized Chinese characters blare the blandishments of fine Oriental cuisine.

But decades ago, the massive restaurant was the site of the Labour Lyceum, a workers' centre that has since moved to Cecil Street.

In a sign of the times, the factory workers the Labour Lyceum represents today are more likely to be Asian than Jewish.

The old United Bakers restaurant on Spadina Avenue, which counted a Jewish Who's Who among its clientele, now sits in a drab strip mall much farther north at Bathurst and Lawrence.

The Standard Theatre, which resounded to Yiddish decades ago, is no more. After being converted into a movie theatre variously known as the Strand and the Victory, it morphed into a seedy burlesque house, and then closed for good.

Many of the garment factories on Spadina Avenue were enclosed in imposing buildings, and one of the grandest is the Balfour Building.

It is presumably named after Arthur James Balfour, the British foreign minister who sanctioned the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which recognized the right of Jews to establish a national homeland in Palestine.

As I learned, the Balfour Building was designed by Benjamin Brown, who is said to be the first Jewish man trained as an architect in Toronto.

D'Arcy Street, a few blocks from the Anshei Minsk Synagogue, has been completely transformed.

The International Taoist Tai Shi Society was where the Shidlover shul was once located, and the Heydon Park Secondary School used to be a Talmud Torah.

Chudleigh House, which resounded to the festivities of Jewish weddings and bar mitzvahs, was also on D'Arcy Street. It is long gone, having been replaced by a complex of bland white brick condominiums.

Area's Jewish roots still evident

Beverley Street, which runs parallel to Spadina, was called Doctor's Row. There Jewish doctors established their practices.

At 27 Baldwin St., the distinctive Yiddish letters gracing a window of John's Italian Café must be something of a mystery to the young men and women who nurse drinks there on a warm summer day.

They probably are not aware of the fact that this café was once Mandel's Creamery.

Beyond a gentle curve of the road, past a pizza parlour, lies the red brick Henry Street Russian Orthodox church.

In its original incarnation, the church was the Beth Jacob Synagogue, also the work of Benjamin Brown.

During its heyday, the shul – which was built by Polish Jews and which took new form in the northern suburbs with its antiquated furnishings in the 1960s – could accommodate about 800 worshippers.

Believe it or not, but the building that currently houses the Polish Combatants Association on Beverley Street was successively the headquarters of the local Zionist movement and the Workmen's Circle.

And where the old Jewish Home for the Aged once stood is now home to the United Steelworkers of America.

Still more amazing, the Cecil Community Centre, a haunt of Chinese immigrants, was first a church and subsequently a synagogue.

Traces of the centre's Jewish roots are plainly in evidence.

Affixed to a wall, near the entrance, are two white marble plaques with gold Hebrew lettering.

The ladies' gallery has been converted into office space.

A chandelier, suspended by a long chain, bespeaks classic synagogue architecture.

The Cecil Community Centre used to be the Ostrovtzer shul.

And a large mirror lines a wall where the bimah was located.

As the informative tour of the Kensington neighbourhood demonstrated, Toronto's Jewish past is embedded in a vibrantly functioning synagogue, redesigned buildings serving different purposes and, of course, in the deep recesses of memory.

Hopeful Argentine immigrants settle in Toronto

By ELYSSE ZAREK
CJN Intern

When the Hermelin family boarded the plane for Toronto at Ezeiza International Airport in Buenos Aires, they had four one-way tickets, eight bulging pieces of luggage and, like most other immigrants, optimism that Canada held a more promising future than their native Argentina.

Despite promotional efforts to lure them to Winnipeg, Andrea Daiam and Fabian Levy-Hara immigrated to Toronto from Buenos Aires with their children Matias, 5, and Melanie, 8.

Because the seasons are opposite in the southern hemisphere, they left Buenos Aires on a chilly winter evening in June and landed in Toronto in the middle of a blistering heat wave. Friends met them at the airport and whisked them off to a new apartment in the suburbs and a new life in Canada.

That was more than a year ago. They had a difficult time when they first arrived, but now they are adjusting to life in Toronto. Luis Hermelin found a job in computers, and his wife Monica Zalcman is hoping to take her pharmacy exams to get her Canadian licence. Their children, Michelle, 15, and Aric, 12, speak perfect English with lilting Spanish accents.

This is the Hermelins' story, but it is also the story of more than 100 other immigrants from Argentina who fled the economic meltdown, insecurity and uncertainty plaguing their country and came to Toronto in search of stability.

"We are proud to be Argentine," says Monica. "We just left because we want a better future."

In the early part of the 20th century, Argentina seemed to have the same bright future as Canada, but a century of corruption, military dictatorships and poor economic choices led it down a different path. After four years of recession, Argentina's economy imploded in December 2001 and the standard of living, once the highest in Latin America, plummeted instantly. The government defaulted on its loans from the International Monetary Fund, devalued the peso and imposed harsh banking restrictions to prevent a run on the banks. The cost of living jumped more than 50 per cent, inflation soared and middle class savings were wiped out.

Now, the bank's austerity measures are easing up, but for millions of Argentines whose savings were reduced to nothing, life isn't much easier. The official unemployment rate recently dropped slightly from 20 per cent to about 16 per cent, although unofficially the figure is still much higher. More than half the country lives below the poverty line and shanty-towns have sprung up in the suburbs of major cities.

Monica Zalcman and husband Luis Hermelin arrived in Canada with their children Michelle, 15, and Aric, 12, in June 2002. "We are proud to be Argentine. We just want a better future."

Security, education, justice, health care, work, pension. Monica Zalcman recites the list of six things that led her and her husband to decide that Argentina wasn't the place where they wanted to grow old, even though they had good jobs, she as a pharmacist and he as an information technology consultant for Exxon Mobil.

"We both had good jobs, even if there was a crisis. But you know the six aspects, they were not going to be changed in years. So to have a job isn't everything to us, because you can have a job one day and not have one the day after," she says.

Planning for the future is very hard in Argentina

Her concerns are echoed by many others. The Hermelins are part of a mass exodus of Argentines. Thousands are reclaiming the citizenship of their ancestors and returning to Spain, France, or Italy. Few choose the United States because of its tough immigration laws, but many arrive in Miami on tourist visas and try to extend their stay indefinitely. Others turn to Mexico, Israel and Canada. In the 2001 census, 4,200 Canadians said they were born in Argentina and more than 9,000 listed their ethnicity as Argentine, and the numbers have increased since then.

The Jewish community in Argentina felt uneasy even before the economic downturn. The bombings of the Israeli embassy in 1992 and AMIA, the Jewish community building, in 1994 scarred its collective psyche and made security its top priority. Synagogues and community centres across Argentina post security guards outside their doors and visitors must show identification before entering. Although it is widely suspected that Hezbollah was responsible for the attacks, former president Carlos Menem's government did little to bring the perpetrators to justice.

"AMIA and the embassy bombing is another issue that pushed us out. It didn't happen directly to us but AMIA was ours. It's been nine years without justice," says Daniel Pomeranchik, who moved here with his wife Gabriela two months ago. They had been planning to leave Argentina since they were married two years ago.

Now, the economic recession has also taken its toll. Out of over 200,000 Jews, about 10,000 have emigrated and more than 61,000 are living below the poverty line. Enrolment in Jewish schools is down and many families can't afford to pay for membership in Jewish community centres. A centre for abused children has sprung up in the Jewish neighbourhood of Once (pronounced "on-say"), and soup kitchens and relief centres provide hot meals and shelter.

Aware of the situation, the aging Jewish communities in Montreal and Winnipeg have been courting Argentine Jews. Ads promoting immigration to Canada are posted throughout Buenos Aires. One touting Winnipeg caught the attention of Fabian Levy-Hara and his wife Andrea Daiam.

"We weren't [consciously] thinking of immigrating, but obviously that was what we had in the back of our minds, because when we saw the notice, it caught our attention," he says.

Shortly after that, Fabian, an IT specialist, and Andrea, an elementary school teacher, chose to come to Toronto with their two children. Despite the promotional efforts of the Manitoba capital, they say they decided on the GTA because it's more cosmopolitan than Winnipeg.

They're here for the long term, they say, because saving money and planning for the future are nearly impossible in Argentina. Like Luis Hermelin and Monica Zalcman, they, too, did not want to grow old in Argentina.

"We saw how our parents worked all their lives only to reach retirement age without any security. When they can't work any more their children have to support them," says Fabian. "The social security is very bad, health care is very bad, the public hospitals are not good and the pensions are a joke. It's nothing, es nada."

Patricia Wendy visited Niagara Falls earlier this summer with husband Daniel and their two children. After a two-year wait for visas, the family came to Toronto from Argentina in June, because their standard of living was "middle class and falling."

Fabian and Andrea got their visas for Canada in November 2001, four months after they applied and one month before the devaluation and the riots that ousted five presidents in less than two weeks. They arrived in April 2002.

"When we got the visas, they were good for one year. We waited and decided to spend Passover there together with the family, the last holiday, then we came," says Andrea.

Shlepping my way to a stronger Jewish identity

By LAUREN KRUGEL
CJN Intern

Jill, my roommate in first year, had never met a Jewish person before she met me.

Among the many things she found amusing about me, Jill was most intrigued by my use of the word "shlep."

Try defining the "shlep" – or any Yiddish word, for that matter – for a non-Jew. It's nearly impossible.

Whether I was shlepping to French class or wearing a shleppy pair of sweat pants, Jill could never stop chuckling at my quirky vocabulary.

Around Christmas time, she would belt out her Yiddish-laced rendition of Jingle Bells – instead of "dashing" through the snow, it was "shlepping."

Latkes and hamantaschen, courtesy of my Bubbie, were also a treat, as Jill had never seen or tasted homemade Jewish cuisine before. I'd leave my room for half an hour, come back and realize my goodies had mysteriously disappeared.

For the first time in my life, I was an oddity, which made me feel both proud and self-conscious. It seemed the farther away I was from other Jews, the more aware I became of my Jewish ideosyncracies.

I grew up in what I like to call a selectively religious household. We're not regular shul-goers, we don't keep kosher and we're not shomrei Shabbat (Saturdays are for Costco expeditions, not shul).

It wasn't until I went away to Carleton University that being Jewish really meant something to me.

I began to miss the jokes, the food, the songs and the simchahs. I missed not having to explain what exactly I ment by "oy vay." While I was never very actively Jewish, a love for my community seemed to seep in through osmosis over the years.

At the same, time it was exciting to meet and exchange stories with people of cultures I would have never encountered in Thornhill (Jill happened to be the first Cree person I had ever met).

With my meagre knowledge of Jewish customs, I would try to explain why I lit a chanukiah during Chanukah (in defiance of the rule against lighting candles in residence rooms) or why I (attempted to) fast on Yom Kippur.

I wasn't alone, thankfully. I had my Bubbie and her friends in Ottawa to welcome me with open arms. I always had a place to go for holiday and Shabbat dinners – and I had my own free dating service to boot (though nothing really worked out with the nice Jewish boys they tried to set me up with).

While I never got involved in the Hillel on campus, I made my own small network of Jewish friends.

The first Jewish friend I made was Jason, a stray Jew my Bubbie's friend took under her wing at a Rosh Hashanah service.

It became a tradition that Jason would throw "Jew-dos" every holiday. He hosted latke parties, matzah brie brunches and potluck Shabbat dinners. These get-togethers often involved large quantities of Maneschewitz wine and more food than our stomachs could handle.

Going away to university was an eye-opening experience in other ways.

Of course, I faced anti-Semitism on campus, but I also had the opportunity to learn about the other side of the Middle East conflict through discussion and debate. The "us versus them" mentality, I learned, is completely counterproductive.

The endless discussions I would have with my Jewish and non-Jewish friends left me feeling more frustrated and more alive than I ever had before. I began to wade into the grey areas, and refused to accept anything I was told at face value – from the Israeli or Palestinian side.

I'll probably never be fluent in Hebrew or strictly observant, but leaving my sheltered Jewish bubble in Thornhill opened the floodgates to new ideas, new challenges and a stronger sense of Jewish identity.

Early Toronto kashruth situation chaotic

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Special to The CJN

The following article is adapted and updated from a series of articles previously published in The CJN in September 1997.

A strong, central body to regulate kashrut is often said to be a hallmark of a sophisticated Jewish community. Certainly, such a body ensures consistency in policy, methodology and philosophy of supervision.

Toronto is one such city, where the Kashruth Council of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto (COR) oversees institutions, businesses and products that wish to be acceptable to the kosher public.

The idea of a single communal body is generally accepted in the city, and COR is considered a reputable hechsher. Some small groups or individual rabbis – such as chassidic dynasties or Sephardim on Pesach – occasionally supervise individual institutions or products that conform to their specific requirements, but they also cooperate with COR.

It was not always that way. At times, the situation has been so rancorous that some sections of the community were either not talking to each other, avoided eating food supervised by one of the other groups, or ostentatiously ate only salads at an institution or function whose kashrut was certified by the "opposing" side.

In the late 19th century, the then-Orthodox Holy Blossom, the first synagogue established in Toronto, imported a shochet from Buffalo to provide the congregation with kosher meat.

The problem, explained Stephen Speisman, former director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and author of The Jews of Toronto; a history to 1937, was that "when Toronto had kosher meat, Buffalo didn't."

Holy Blossom soon hired a congregational minister who was also a shochet, and arranged for a butcher at the St. Lawrence Market to keep a separate table and set of utensils for kosher meat. While anyone could use the meat, Holy Blossom members had the first choice of cuts, and the rest of the community took what was left over. For many, it was not a satisfactory solution.

In the years before World War II, some attempts were made to have a universal kashrut system, but the efforts were sporadic and eventually ceased.

People shopped using the principle that the food would be kosher if they bought from a butcher or baker they knew and trusted. However, there was a good deal of fraud, with meat being advertised as kosher that wasn't, and conflicts of interest often affected the supervision.

This chaotic situation could not continue, especially with the influx of religious survivors of the Holocaust who demanded reputably supervised kosher meat, poultry and baked goods.

Meyer Gasner, an active and respected communal leader, became the founding chair of the Division of Orthodox Synagogues, in the early 1950s. Under his leadership, rabbis, community leaders and representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress joined to establish a body to supervise kashrut.

An early report by Gasner charged that only 50 per cent of poultry sold in Toronto as kosher, at kosher prices, was actually ritually slaughtered by a shochet.

He also charged that some butchers who catered to the Jewish community and displayed the word "kosher" on their windows and in their ads, used meat that was treif.

In 1954, after much negotiation, the new division signed co-operation agreements with rabbis David Ochs, Meyer Greenwald and Avraham Aron Price, in which each side agreed to accept the supervisory jurisdiction of the other.

But the situation was not fully remedied until the 1960s, when the federal government's Department of Consumer Affairs passed a law forbidding the fraudulent use of labelling, packaging, advertising or selling food that did not meet the requirements of kashrut.

For over 30 years, Rabbi Gedaliah Felder, a renowned talmudic scholar, was chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, the body of rabbis that served as advisors and consultants to the kashrut department. In addition to his scholarship, Rabbi Felder was respected and accepted by all segments of the Jewish community.

This also applied to Nachman Shemen, an ordained rabbi and scholar (he did not use his title of "rabbi" in his work with the kashrut department), who was executive director of the vaad for nearly 50 years.

Shemen and Rabbi Felder were succeeded at their deaths by rabbis Yitzchak Kerzner and Mordechai Levin.

The Kashruth Council, as it is now called, supervises a growing number of restaurants, bakeries, butcher shops and institutions. It publishes a regularly updated guide to kosher products and businesses, and is planning to open a Web site.

Many people believe that kashrut supervision is, or should be, a straightforward, mechanical matter, and they find it hard to understand why kosher products are more expensive than non-kosher ones, especially meat and poultry.

Some of the difference is easily explained. Kosher schchitah (ritual slaughter) is a more expensive process than non-kosher slaughter, because of its meticulous attention to methods used, the acceptability of far fewer pieces of meat or poultry and the fact that only the front half of a cow can be used. (The back half is sold to non-kosher butchers.)

As well, because there is so much more non-kosher meat available, stores can offer much better specials on it.

Mashgiach checks products at every stage of preparation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

David Berk of Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers, says the basic rule behind operating a kosher catering business is that if the kitchen is open, the mashgiach is there.

The mashgiach, or kashrut supervisor, who is there under a contractual agreement with the Kashruth Council of Toronto, checks all products brought into the kitchen, and supervises the preparation of food.

He also takes any new equipment such as pots and pans or cutlery to the mikvah to be properly koshered. All glass, metal and ceramic utensils are toiveled – immersed in a vessel mikvah in a separate room, using water that flows from the same source as that used in the main part of the mikvah.

Berk, who provides catering at four synagogues, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Adath Israel, Pride of Israel and Adath Shalom, as well as for private clients, says his mashgiach, a Lubavitch rabbi with smichah from Israel, ensures that every food item brought into their establishment has an approved hechsher.

He is also in charge of checking produce such as lettuce, broccoli and asparagus tips for bugs, he says.

Currently, the Kashruth Council of Toronto forbids the use of berries such as raspberries or blackberries because those fruits are too difficult to check.

"They are very delicate and once they are checked they are not suitable for use. They cannot be washed sufficiently to satisfy kosher requirements," Berk says.

The mashgiach is also involved in supervising food that is cooked in Zuchter Berk's own kitchens and transported to off-site locations.

"He ensures that all the food is packed up and sealed, and is only opened at the other end by another mashgiach. It is a strict chain of events; we are not allowed to tamper with any box that has already been sealed."

Berk says the Kashruth Council of Toronto is continually updating information about kosher products, and caterers are kept right up to date. "We are not a dairy caterer, so it is essential for us to ensure that every product we use is pareve or meat."

Miriam Myerovitz, of Miriam's Table, who caters at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, as well as for private functions, says the mashgiach – their former mashgiach has now been replaced by his son – checks all their bills to ensure that items come from a kosher establishment.

"People can be assured that if the Kashruth Council declares a kitchen kosher, it is kosher."

Kosher grocery items, on the other hand, are not generally more expensive than non-kosher brands. A spokesperson from the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations, whose OU hechsher is one of the most often seen and respected, told The CJN that food manufacturing companies consider kosher supervision a marketing device, a means of attracting more customers, and feel that the costs are evened out by the goodwill generated.

Many large supermarket chains have an increasing number of house brand products under kosher supervision. This brings the cost down considerably, since their prices are determined the same way as those of the non-kosher products. President's Choice, Smart Choice and Our Compliments, for instance, have extensive and high quality kosher product lines.

Finally, the higher prices of kosher products from Israel and the United States reflect the cost of shipping and handling, as well as the poor showing of the Canadian dollar as compared to the American.

Other foods besides meat and poultry offer challenges for kashrut supervisors, particularly in the face of rapidly changing food production technologies. Thus, Rabbi Levin, an expert in ingredients and flavours used in processed products, and supervisors and inspectors must have a wide knowledge of the complexities of food technology and biochemistry.

Some 700 mashgichim – inspectors and supervisors – oversee cooking or manufacturing processes in businesses, institutions and restaurants. This involves keeping files on all the ingredients used to prepare, process and preserve a product, as well as any changes in those processes that manufacturers may introduce from time to time.

As well, they must ensure that the equipment used is acceptable by halachic standards. For instance, a company may begin to process baked beans in the same equipment in which it processes pork and beans.

Bakeries must ensure that in the baking process, challah is taken. Halachah demands that whenever a certain amount of flour is used in a recipe, some of it must be separated and burned in the oven. This practice was implemented to replicate somewhat the sacrifices in the Temple.

Oil can also be problematic. The term "vegetable oil" does not always mean that there is absolutely no animal fat – government labelling laws permit a tiny amount of an ingredient to be omitted from the ingredient label.

Cheese may contain rennet, a coagulant that often contains animal products.

Vegetables, which at first appear to have no kashrut considerations, do in fact have to be checked. Rabbi Levin explained that with government bans on the use of pesticides, there are often bugs, which we are not permitted to eat, in the folds and flowerets of vegetables. While in a private home it is easy to carefully check a head of lettuce or broccoli, a large facility, which might easily use several hundred lettuces for a salad course, would find it far more difficult.

It is acceptable, he said, to use vegetables such as asparagus and broccoli if they are carefully cleaned, washed, inspected and then ground up, for example, to make soup.

Certain vegetables, like romaine lettuce which for some unknown reason seems to attract bugs, require so much checking, that it is simply not warranted to use them, he said, although new technologies being developed, such as hydroponics, may help.

Krispy Kreme doughnuts at centre of kashrut controversy

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Kashruth Council of Canada (COR), perhaps Canada's premier kashrut supervisory body, is embroiled in a dispute over doughnuts.

Late last summer, Krispy Kreme, a large American doughnut manufacturer based in Winston-Salem, N.C., opened a restaurant outside Hillcrest Mall in Richmond Hill. It was the company's second location in Canada – the first was in Mississauga – but the new one had one major difference: its doughnuts were kosher.

They were not, however, under the supervision of COR. Instead, the doughnuts (not the restaurant proper, it must be noted) are under the supervision of KSA, Kosher Supervisors of America, a Los Angeles-based kashrut body.

Although no one, including COR, questions the validity of KSA as a hechsher on packaged goods, the acceptability of the Richmond Hill Krispy Kreme doughnuts has become a serious bone of contention, as well as a ubiquitous subject of conversation, among kashrut-observant Jews.

This has caused particular confusion in the mind of many members of the public, because packaged goods supervised by such out-of-town agencies as O-U, O-K, Star-K, MK and the Chicago Rabbinical Council (CRC) are seen everywhere.

COR insists that since there is established and accepted kashrut supervision in the GTA, KSA has no right to issue its own hechsher here. Many of the city's rabbis agree and have advised their congregations not to buy Krispy Kreme doughnuts.

COR has gone further, ordering establishments under its supervision to remove all products with a KSA hechsher from their shelves. Supermarkets, such as Sobey's on Clark Avenue in Thornhill, which has a large kosher section, do carry KSA products, although not in their kosher sections.

Jason Greenspan, customer relationship manager of KremeKo, which operates Krispy Kreme stores in Canada, except for British Columbia, said the company wanted to have a uniform standard of kashrut across the country.

"KSA allows us to have a kosher product across Canada. It is a hechsher that is recognized across Canada and around the world."

All the stores are supervised by local mashgichim, Greenspan said. The doughnut mix, however, which is supplied by the parent company, is under the supervision of Kosher Overseers of America (KOA), a hechsher based, as is KSA, in Los Angeles. Other ingredients, such as sugar, are bought locally, and must have proper hechshers.

KSA takes no responsibility for products sold in the outlets other than the doughnuts, Greenspan said.

Rabbi Binyomin Lisbon, rabbinic administrator of KSA, said Krispy Kreme doughnuts are certified kosher on the same basis as any manufactured product, such as cookies or salad dressing. Even if they are baked by non-Jews or baked by them on Shabbat, they can still be kosher, he said.

"When you buy a box of cookies, you don't even think about when they were made, or who made them. Just that they are properly supervised."

Kashrut dispute centres on doughnuts

Rabbi Ari Weiss of Toronto co-ordinates the relationship between KSA and Krispy Kreme in the GTA. He noted that MK supervises Krispy Kreme doughnuts in Montreal, as does Star-K in Baltimore.

"We feel that we have an obligation to provide kashrut supervision when possible," Rabbi Weiss said. "It is a vital service to the Jewish community."

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of the Kashruth Council, told The CJN, "We are not saying that Krispy Kreme is kosher, or that it is not kosher. We simply don't know enough about the workings of KSA [in Toronto] to make any decisions."

Part of COR's concern is that Krispy Kreme does not comply with one of its main criteria: Shabbat observance. The business is open on Shabbat, and doughnuts are baked on that day.

Rabbi Kerzner said the decision to not recognize Krispy Kreme doughnuts "wasn't only my personal opinion. It was unanimously endorsed by the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth."

There is no way "we can supervise what is happening on Shabbat, and we don't know exactly what is going on or the procedures that are carried out in the manufacture of these doughnuts," he said.

But kashrut itself is not the only question. It is a matter of maintaining COR's status as the only source of kashrut supervision in the city.

COR is a non-profit organization and seeks only to cover its expenses, which are mainly the salaries of mashgichim and the costs of administration.

Other large cities, such as Los Angeles and New York, have considerably larger Jewish populations than Toronto and the effects of having multiple hechshers there are not as great. If several supervisory bodies were competing in the city for business, Toronto, with a finite number of Jewish firms and institutions, could easily find itself either without a central body at all, or inundated with unacceptable or downright fraudulent hechshers. This is certainly what has happened in New York, for instance.

On the other hand, some in the community think that having competition in the kashrut supervisory system would bring down the cost of keeping kosher in Toronto. Others say there is no concrete evidence to prove that this is so.

After-Shabbat seating ban hits eateries

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Pizza is at the centre of a second kashrut controversy in the city.

Kosher restaurants on the strip of Bathurst Street just south of Lawrence Avenue have been instructed by a number of local roshei yeshiva – on pain of losing their hechshers, the owners believe – to forbid seating after Shabbat – that is, to operate only as take-out – and to close at 11:30 p.m.

There are appear to be two somewhat interconnected reasons for these directives. First, this is the area where the murder of David Rosenzweig took place last summer, and it's reputed to be one where illegal drugs are easily obtained. The alleged killer was said to be looking for drugs the night of the murder.

As well, it is also a place where frum youths of both sexes congregate and socialize after Shabbat. Several roshei yeshiva feel this kind of behaviour is unacceptable.

Restaurants where youngsters do not tend to hang out do seat patrons after Shabbat. As well, restaurants elsewhere in the city, including branches of those on the Bathurst-Lawrence strip, also seat patrons.

Restaurant owners, when asked who was responsible for the orders, attributed them somewhat vaguely to "the rabbis."

But both Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of the Kashruth Council, and Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council, told The CJN emphatically that these directives did not come from COR.

RONEN BERCOVITCH – A Medical Miracle

At 23, in the prime of his young life, Ronen Bercovitch, a member of the Golani Divison was injured by a hand grenade during an anti-terrorist mission in Lebanon. Ronen suffered the loss of one leg and severe blood loss; his odds of survival were slim. Ronen's mother prayed that any disability could be managed as long as he just survived. He answered her prayers and has since achieved so much more. Doctors have referred to Ronen as a medical miracle.

Ronen has fought hard through intense pain with sheer determination and is now, 3 years later, physically rehabilitated and studying for a business degree. "It has been through the emotional and physical support of Beit Halochem that I am able to resume a 'normal' life. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow: a progress report

and LAUREN KRUGEL
Staff Reporters

Hard hat on head and cellphone in hand, Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, led a small tour group through the construction site of the Jewish campus group's soon-to-be headquarters last month.

The long-awaited Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life – Canada's first "purpose-built" Hillel centre – is scheduled to open in October at the northwest corner of Huron and Harbord streets. The 12,000-square-foot building will serve Jewish students at the University of Toronto's downtown campus and will also house the staff of Hillel of Greater Toronto, the umbrella for Jewish students groups at U of T, York University, Ryerson University and Seneca College.

Miles Nadal JCC [Lauren Krugel photo]

"It's very exciting," said Kaye. Although the skylit canopied entrance promises to be "quite dramatic," he is equally ebullient about the basement of the three-story building, with its kitchen and 150-person seating capacity. It will be a great place for seminars, he said, not to mention Shabbat dinners.

The main floor will house a student lounge with a gas fireplace and offices for U of T Hillel staff. Upstairs, a resource room and semi-circular "spiritual space" will be the main focus. There is even a sukkah balcony, Kaye pointed out.

Kaye's office and office space for his staff, along with two apartments, are on the third floor.

In addition to function, the Wolfond Centre will offer visual appeal, said Kaye. "[Architect] Susan [Friedrich] put a lot of thought into the esthetic look of the building."

Kaye said the centre will be "a place for students to hang out, to study and to do Jewish learning." With time he hopes Hillel can provide an increasing number of meals.

He said Hillel will continue to have a visible presence on campus, with tables and programs, even though it now has a well-located building that is significantly more appealing than its former, cramped basement location. "We want to be out there."

Meanwhile, a few blocks away at the southwest corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, the 50-year-old Miles Nadal JCC is finishing up a massive facelift to help it continue as the epicentre of downtown Jewish life.

This weekend, the centre will be "open from the ground up," said executive director Naomi Rose from her temporary office a few doors down.

While many older people in the community remember going to dances and other events in the old building's heyday, a number of new activities are being offered within the centre's new gleaming glass facade.

Rose said at first she underestimated the number of Jews who could benefit from the Nadal JCC. According to the 2001 census, about 32,000 Jews live between Eglinton Avenue and Lakeshore Boulevard.

Rose said she hopes the centre will be a "magnet for Jewish people to gather."

The revamped building will accommodate a wider variety of programs, she said. The centre plans to expand activities for teens, seniors and young adults. A toddler shabbat program and expanded holiday services will start in early September.

"We're capitalizing on the expanded space. We're looking forward to renewed levels of activity," she said.

Rose said the Nadal JCC will also provide the only venue for Toronto's "vibrant Jewish arts community." The Al Green Theatre, formerly a small gymnasium, has been transformed into a professional-quality, 288-seat performance space. She said the stage's shock-absorbing sprung floor makes it ideal for dance and theatre, while the theatre's retractable seating makes it a "flexible space" that can also be used for parties and dances.

The retail shops that line the first floor of the JCC facing Bloor Street have "been an advantage to anyone who lives in the neighbourhood," said Rose. In addition to a Second Cup right on the corner, there is also a bubble tea shop and a newsstand.

New campuses to meet future needs of Toronto's Jews

Another new addition is the Minto Corporation Technology Centre, where students and others in the community can sharpen their computer skills.

While members continue to work out and take fitness classes in the building, these programs will also undergo some changes. What is now the gutted bottom floor of the Nadal JCC will be a state-of-the-art fitness centre by next spring.

The Wolfond Centre and the Nadal JCC constitute the downtown "campus" of an ambitious three-pronged plan, known as Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), which was launched by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 2000 to meet the long-term needs of the city's Jewish community, including a Jewish population in York Region that is expected to reach more than 75,000 people by 2010.

The other two campuses – the Lipa Green Building/Bathurst Jewish Community Centre site and a 50-acre lot at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill – are now the subject of extensive discussions with municipal officials, planners and federation leadership, said Howard English, federation's director of marketing and communications. "The proposed projects will be unprecedented in scope and quality, not only for our city, but for North America as well."

More details are expected to be announced in the fall, he said.

Architect firms' records now at Ontario Jewish Archives

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Photographs, blueprints and press clippings documenting the career of the late Toronto architect Harold Kaplan and his firm Kaplan and Sprachman are now in the Ontario Jewish Archives.

Records of Kaplan and Sprachman's work are also at the City of Toronto Archives, the Archives of Ontario and the National Archives of Canada.

Kaplan's two daughters, Phyllis Pepper of Toronto, a physio/occupational therapist, and Ruthetta Reiss of New York, an architect, donated the materials to OJA. They said they wanted their father's contribution to Canadian architecture available to Toronto's Jewish community.

"As we started going through my father's papers, we found out that the Jewish archives did not have any of his memorabilia," Pepper said. "So we decided that this was where we wanted his material to remain permanently."

Kaplan was a partner with Abraham Sprachman at Kaplan and Sprachman from the early 1920s to 1965.

Kaplans a "traditional family"

When he was a teenager, Harold went to Philadelphia to live with his uncle, where he learned draftsmanship. When he returned to Toronto, he attended night school and graduated in architecture. He married Dorothy Spain in 1923.

The Kaplans, who belonged to Holy Blossom Temple, were "a very traditional family," Pepper said.

Pepper remembers her father as "a very refined man." She said he would go to work early in the morning and arrive home promptly at 6 p.m. for dinner with the family. He would wear his silk smoking jacket during dinner, and he would return to his Dundas Street office every evening.

Harold continued to work as an architectural consultant after Kaplan and Sprachman was dissolved in 1965. He died in 1973, at the age of 77. The Kaplans had four grandchildren, Andrew and Douglas Pepper, and Jonathan and Rosemary Reiss, and seven great-grandchildren.

Shaarei Tefillah Congregation

3600 Bathurst St.

What are you looking for when you join a Synagogue? The obvious answer is to join an established congregation. Shaarei Tefillah has been at the heart of the Toronto Jewish community for over 50 years. Shaarei Tefillah looks to its rich heritage to forge its path to our future. Shaarei Tefillah is an Orthodox Synagogue adjacent to Associated Hebrew Day Schools as well as Baycrest Hospital. Shaarei Tefillah benefits from both the energy of our youth and the wisdom of our elders as our nearest neighbours. Shaarei Tefillah is a fully handicapped accessible Synagogue, including sanctuary, washrooms and banquet hall. We strive to be peanut and nut free for allergy sensitive people. As the old song goes: "Don't you want to go where everyone knows your name?" Shaarei Tefillah is just the place.

Shaarei Tefillah is a friendly warm Synagogue. We like to think of ourselves as a large family. We share each other's simchas and unfortunately each other's tragedies. We offer daily services in the mornings, evenings, Shabbat and holiday services, under the spiritual guidance of Rabbi Moshe Stern. Our youth have their own services and their programmes including their own kiddishes, Bat Mitzvah programme, boys choir, visiting the elderly etc. Our toddlers are well looked after by a certified E.C.E. on Shabbat and Holiday mornings. There is a full range of adult programmes that run the gamut from one-one learning, lectures, ladies classes, street fighting and well run Sisterhood.

Ready to join Shaarei Tefillah yet? For a limited time only we are offering a one year FREE MEMBERSHIP at our Synagogue. Please call the Synagogue office 416-787-1631 for details.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, our esteemed spiritual leader will again conduct services during the forthcoming High Holy Days. Shlomo Goldrecih and Chazzan Yossi Lebovics will lead the Shacharit and Musaf services in a manner which only enhances the holiness of these Days of Awe. High Holy Day services will be conducted in the beautiful Shaarei Tefillah Sanctuary and auxiliary services will be conducted in the Hetty Josephs Banquet Hall. For information on High Holy Day Tickets, please call the Synagogue Office at 416-787-1631.

JIAS Toronto looking for volunteers to befriend immigrants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Janice Roth, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto for the past four months, says the community has an obligation to ensure it's a welcoming place for everybody. "That's my framework."

Some people think the agency, which serves about 800 families a year, is "very Russian," she said, referring to the largest proportion of immigrants JIAS serves, but it also serves French-speaking, Hebrew-speaking and Spanish-speaking immigrants who hail mainly from Argentina.

"All services have to be available in all languages," said Roth in an interview in her office. She works in the Lipa Green Building, adjacent to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre where she was director of programming for six years before taking on her new position.

Work is 'uplifting'

A social worker by profession, Roth worked with people who have developmental disabilities at the Miriam Home in her native Montreal before she moved to Toronto in 1997. It helped shape her "focus on developing inclusive communities," she said.

Roth sees JIAS Toronto's role not just as resettlement but integration. "I see JIAS as the Jewish community's agency to build the community to be receptive to immigrants' needs, to make it more welcoming and to work with the established agencies to ensure that the immigrants' needs are met."

A task force that co-ordinates services for Argentine immigrants among different agencies reflects that vision. The group includes JIAS Toronto, JVS, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Jewish Information Service.

But "we'll use it as a framework for welcoming all immigrants," whose priority needs are employment, affordable housing and day care, Roth said.

Poverty is "quite high" among immigrants, she said, adding that it's more common than one might think for three generations to live in a one- or two-bedroom apartment with one washroom.

"I don't think people realize what it means to start over," said Roth. "There are a lot of costs associated with upgrading and retraining, in addition to resettling... Even if they know the situation in advance, it doesn't change living it. That initial period is incredibly unsettling."

Difficulties notwithstanding, Roth said her work is "really uplifting. People come with hope and excitement, and it's our job to maintain that as we help them find their way."

While JIAS' job is to offer services to clients, it's also to educate and sensitize the community, Roth believes. "There are educated and skilled immigrants, but it doesn't necessarily translate into a job here."

JIAS also helps families integrate Jewishly, Roth said. Although JIAS Toronto has facilitated Passover seder invitations and High Holy Day synagogue tickets in the past, now the organization is also looking to match immigrant families with established families who can befriend them and advise them on things like schools and other neighbourhood amenities.

The Toronto agency, with one volunteer worker and a staff of seven, including Roth, is in the final stages of becoming an independent agency as part of a restructuring process that has taken almost two years.

Previously, JIAS Toronto and its counterpart in Montreal were both affiliated with JIAS Canada, which now deals with immigration issues in other communities.

Jias restructured

"Certainly there will be work we'll be doing together, but it will be a separate agency," said Roth.

JIAS Canada, which used to be housed in the Lipa Green Building with JIAS Toronto, moved on May 1 to new 900-square-foot premises in an office building on Dufferin Street, north of Finch Avenue.

Mila Voihanski, executive director of the national agency and immediate past acting director of JIAS Toronto, said that although the two organizations are "still legally one," they are acting independently, with separate boards and budgets.

In fact, budgeting was restructured July 1, 2001. Prior to that, UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) funded the JIAS offices in Montreal and Toronto, as well as the national agency. Now the Montreal agency receives its funding from Federation CJA, and JIAS Toronto is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The rest of Canada – informally referred to as ROC – still receives funding from UIAFC. The national office deals with immigration issues in communities from Vancouver to the Maritimes. JIAS Canada purchases services from local Jewish family service agencies, Jewish federations or Jewish community centres, said Voihanski, a social worker and native of Ukraine who has worked for JIAS for 28 of the 29 years she's been in Canada.

New standards to be used across Canada

The national office, staffed by Voihanski, her assistant and a part-time bookkeeper, deals with government advocacy and public relations on immigration and refugee issues, such as family reunification, that apply to the entire country, said Voihanski.

Part of her role, she said, is to serve as the "in-house consultant" on immigration for all communities except Toronto and Montreal.

This October, she will attend a national conference on settlement in Calgary as an Ontario delegate. In May, she ran a conference for professionals whose services JIAS Canada uses.

JIAS Canada task forces address issues such as guidelines for financial assistance, which have varied from one city to another in the past, said Voihanski.

In February, the board approved a set of standards to be used across Canada, said Voihanski.

Funding has become more challenging under the new structure, said Voihanski, because Montreal and Toronto are the "biggest contributors to the national responsibility envelope."

JIAS Canada's budget was increased for the 2003-2004 year by $205,000, mostly to meet financial assistance needs in Vancouver.

"The immigrant community [in Vancouver] has increased and [the number of] new families is almost the same as in Toronto. Also, the economic situation in Vancouver is very poor. The labour market is very poor, social service programs have been cut, and there is extremely little affordable housing."

Because of that, she said, Jewish immigrants tend to settle farther from the Jewish community and Jewish institutions, leading to difficulties with integration.

Perry Romberg, the director of planning and community services for UIAFC, told The CJN that the pressure on the Canadian Jewish dollar is very high because of the need to balance local and national needs with the needs of Israel, Argentina and the former Soviet Union.

"It puts a huge responsibility on us."

"Zucker" synonymous with preparation for bar and bat mitzvah

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For many people in Toronto, the phrase bar and bat mitzvah teacher is synonymous with the name Phillip (Faivel) Zucker.

For more than 40 years, the gentle, soft-spoken Hebrew teacher taught more than 2,000 students how to daven and recite their Torah portions.

"It has long been said that anyone trained by Mr. Zucker can layn [read] virtually anything, even at a moment's notice," said Ralph Wintrob, a retired educator who studied with Zucker for more than two years.

"He is very knowledgeable and understands the content of the Torah completely and totally and its interpretations. You can ask him any question and he will give you an instant answer."

Zucker taught at the Associated Hebrew Schools for 32 years, and served as baal koreh (Torah reader) at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue for 40 years.

Phillip and Helen Zucker

Zucker was born in Serock, Poland, and as a teenager, he went to study at the Nvardoker yeshiva. At the outbreak of World War II, at the age of 21, he was taken prisoner by the Nazis, and sent across the border into Russian occupied eastern Poland, where the Jews worked in hard labour camps.

When the war was over in 1945, he was approached by a woman who begged him to marry her sister Chaja (Helen) Tuchman, who had lost her citizenship papers and was unable to leave the area.

Tuchman's family were from Kosow, 10 kilometres from Treblinka. She and her family had also been transported to Russian occupied Poland.

Zucker said he wasn't thinking of marrying, but Tuchman's sister insisted and they were married in the Russian territory.

Zucker proud of contribution to Shaarei Shomayim

"It took us 10 days to get a rabbi and we had to gather a minyan," he said. "We were married in a town near Kirov in 1946."

They were repatriated back to Poland in 1946. Zucker recalled that the long journey back to the border was a joyous trip during which they sang about the Messiah, songs filled with the hope of reuniting with family and friends.

To their surprise, when they crossed the border to Poland at Brest-Litovsk, they were greeted with stones and angry chants from the stone throwers shouting, "They are still alive."

They were in shock, Zucker said. They closed the wagon doors, and began to understand that they could not return to their own towns.

He discovered that his entire family – siblings, parents, grandparents and more than 100 extended family members – had perished in the Holocaust. As well, all of Helen Zucker's family in Poland had been killed.

They lived in Lodz for six months, but when they learned of a pogrom in nearby Kielce, Philip said, they ran. With the assistance of the Jewish underground, they crossed several borders. Their first daughter, Fay, was born in Germany.

In 1949, they came to Canada where Helen had a sister. They had two more daughters, Shirley and Bella. Phillip went to work in a men's sportswear factory for $35 a week. He was there for three years, but he wanted to earn more money.

"That Yom Kippur, I prayed to be able to make $1,000 more a year. Shortly afterwards, my prayers were answered when Jack Burke, principal of the evening school at the Associated Hebrew Schools, called and offered me a job.

'That Yom Kippur, I prayed to be able to make $1,000 more a year'

"I didn't think I knew the chanting. Mr. Burke opened a chumash, and asked me to read. After a minute, he said I was hired for $1,000 for the year. For seven years, I worked in the factory during the day and taught bar mitzvah at night. When a full-time job became available at the day school, I gave up the factory job."

The Zuckers have been members of Shaarei Shomayim for 44 years. Phillip had a stroke in 2000 and left his position as baal koreh there. He was paralyzed on one side, but today, after ongoing therapy, he has almost totally recovered.

"I have been very blessed to have good-hearted people in the shul who have helped me a great deal," Zucker said. He attends services at Shaarei Shomayim every morning. Since he no longer can walk to Shaarei Shomayim, on Shabbat he attends Beit Haminyan, which is a block from his house. He still reads the Torah sometimes. And he studies Talmud several times a week.

Looking back, he said he is pleased that he was part of the building of Shaarei Shomayim.

"I supplied young boys and girls with the knowledge to chant a Haftorah or the Megillah, and I believe this helped enlarge the membership."

Zucker's commitment to his students and his synagogue is recognized by many families.

"My husband is so committed to his work that we rarely took a vacation," Helen Zucker said. "We were given a trip to Israel on Shaarei Shomayim's 25th anniversary and by the Associated Hebrew Schools on his retirement – and we made three other trips to Israel."

The Zuckers have nine grandchildren, one great-grandchild and another one on the way.

Slow adjustment to Canadian ways

Although their five-year-old son adjusted quickly, they still worry about the impression that Argentina left on their eight-year-old daughter. Melanie watched the street riots from their balcony, and Fabian fears that she incorrectly associated the riots with their leaving.

Melanie, however, has other concerns. She wants to know how Canadian children live. Do kids here take their baths before or after dinner-time, she wonders.

The lifestyle changes, from an eight-year-old's perspective, are huge. "In Buenos Aires we eat at 9 p.m. Here the kids are asleep by 9 p.m.," Fabian explains.

During the two years that Patricia Wendy and her husband Daniel waited for their visa applications to be processed, they researched Toronto so they would know exactly what they had to do when they got here.

In Buenos Aires, Patricia worked developing educational programs but had lost her job. Daniel was doing contract work in the computer industry. They were living off their savings and their situation was, as Patricia puts it, "middle class and falling." Even the tension on the city streets was palpable.

"It was hard to go out on the street there. Every day you found out that someone was killed or someone was kidnapped, so you went out with fear. That was the kind of insecurity that we could look forward to in the future," she says in Spanish.

Patricia and Daniel considered going to Israel, but decided against it because of her worries.

"It seems to me that it would be harder to break into Israeli society because the culture is very different from ours. None of us speaks Hebrew. And there is also insecurity there. To leave one insecure country to go to another insecure country – no. Living in Israel with the permanent conflict and the insecurity frightened me a lot."

Still Miss Argentina

They chose Toronto because it had more in common with Buenos Aires than Vancouver and Winnipeg, the other cities they considered, and arrived in June after waiting two years for visas. Neither Patricia nor Daniel has found a job yet, nor did they have a permanent address until recently, when Monica Zalcman helped them find an apartment in her building.

Patricia has noticed small differences between Toronto and Buenos Aires. For instance, she says, in Toronto, there is more greenery, everyone seems to speak a second language and bank machines always have money.

Her two daughters, ages 10 and 6, are getting used to calling Canada home, but she says it hasn't been easy.

"The older one says, 'I want to go back, I miss my friends, my grandparents, my cousins. I want to go back.' But on the other hand, she goes to summer camp and comes back happy," Patricia says. "It's a process that's going to take several months."

* * *

Despite their new life here, Andrea Daiam and Fabian Levy-Hara miss their native country.

She misses their house and their friends. He misses seeing familiar faces on the street, and has even taken to doing things that he's never done before.

"I started to listen to tango," says Fabian. "I've never listened to tango, and now I've started to listen to it."

Jews for Judaism

www.jewsforjudaism.org

UJA Federation

Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region

BY RABBI MICHAEL SKOBAC

This summer, the Jewish community of Toronto will be the target of an aggressive missionary crusade by the notorious Jews for Jesus organization. From August 25 until September 14, they will blitz our city with a slick mass marketing campaign to convert Jews to Christianity. JEWS FOR JUDAISM, the world's leading counter-missionary organization, has prepared this practical guide to help you understand the tactics of groups like Jews for Jesus, and show you how to respond to their challenges.

WHO'S BEHIND JEWS FOR JESUS?

Most Christian denominations, including Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches and most mainline Protestant groups, such as the United Church, no longer have programs to convert Jews. On the other hand, Evangelical Protestants, who constitute about 10% of the Canadian population, devote a tremendous amount of money and energy to promote their faith among Jews. These Evangelicals fund over 1,000 different ministries worldwide, with over 40 in southern Ontario, that specifically target the Jewish community for conversion. Jews for Jesus is the largest and best-known of these groups. Their upcoming crusade in Toronto is part of a five-year, multimillion-dollar campaign targeting over 60 cities worldwide with Jewish populations of over 25,000.

• Why do Evangelical Christians seek to convert us?

Evangelicals assert that the only way to have a relationship with G-d is by embracing Jesus. They feel driven to "save" all non-Christians who they believe will be doomed to an eternity in hell unless they convert.

• But isn't it true that Evangelical Christians are very supportive of Israel?

Yes. Many Evangelicals are lending important political and financial support to the State of Israel. However, most of them also engage in, or support, efforts to convert Jews.

Over 250,000 Jews have been converted to Christianity over the past 30 years.

• Are these missionary groups really a serious threat?

Unfortunately, these groups have become increasingly successful. Over the past 30 years, more than 250,000 Jews have been converted and the numbers continue to grow.

• Why are these missionaries so successful?

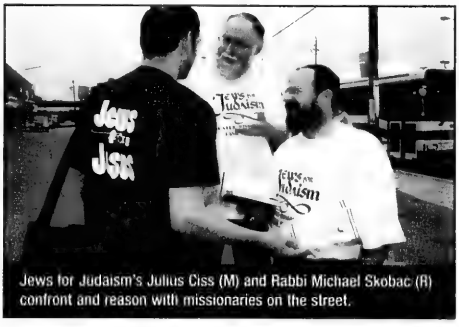
There are two significant factors. The first is the increasing vulnerability of Jews due to a lack of solid Jewish education and meaningful Jewish spiritual experiences. The second is the missionaries' development of a cunning marketing strategy designed to overcome resistance to conversion and feelings of guilt by promoting the deceptive message, "It's Jewish to believe in Jesus". Some of their tactics include mimicking Jewish holidays and rituals. For example, missionaries may wear skullcaps and prayer shawls, light Shabbat candles and celebrate Chanukah. They distort the meanings of these practices, claiming, for example, that the three matzos at the Passover Seder symbolize the Christian Trinity. In addition, they frequently use misleading euphemisms, such as 'rabbi' in place of pastor, 'become a completed Jew' instead of 'convert to Christianity', 'mikvah service' for baptism and 'synagogue' instead of church.



Jews for Judaism's Julius Ciss (M) and Rabbi Michael Skobac (R) confront and reason with missionaries on the street.

FAST FACTS ON JEWS FOR JESUS

- Jews for Jesus and similar groups claim to be Jews who have come to believe in Jesus.

Actually, many members of groups like Jews for Jesus and even their leadership are gentiles. They are not and have never been Jews.

- They claim that it is "Jewish" to believe in Jesus and that Jews can retain their Jewish identity even after becoming Christians.

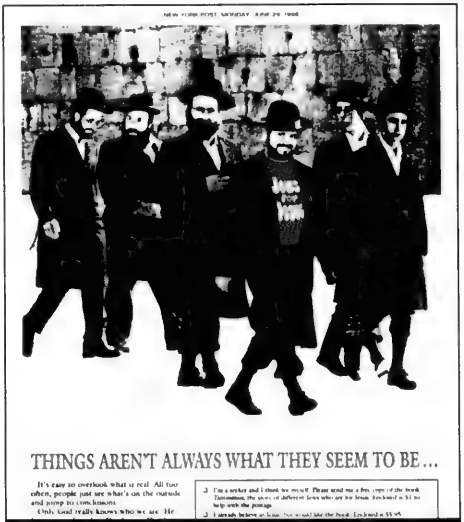
Being Jewish is not just a matter of lineage, but includes being part of a faith community. Therefore, people who were not born Jews can become Jews by embracing the spiritual path of Judaism. Jews who convert to another religion voluntarily cut themselves off from the Jewish faith community.

That Jesus and his followers were Jews does not automatically confer Jewish legitimacy to their movement. The worshippers of the Golden Calf in the desert were also Jews – but being Jews didn't make them right. There was nothing "Jewish" about their idol worship.

As soon as the followers of Jesus changed the Jewish concept of Messiah from a human redeemer who leads the world to a utopian age into a divine saviour who dies to atone for sin, they began transforming into a different religion. This critical change led to the development of a comprehensive theology that dramatically veered from its Jewish roots, and was eventually formalized with the canonization of a set of scriptures vastly different from Judaism's Bible.

Regardless of their superficial attempts to appear Jewish, "Jews for Jesus" is an oxymoron and a theological contradiction. Putting on skullcaps or sprinkling their conversations with Hebrew or Yiddish expressions doesn't change the fact that they are following a religion that is not Jewish! A Jew who converts to Christianity is like a vegetarian who begins to eat meat. Even if he continues to eat vegetables, his diet can no longer be considered vegetarian.



A Jews for Jesus promotion that appeared on large public billboards and as full-page newspaper ads depicts their missionaries as Chassidic Jews at the Kotel.

- Since they clearly identify themselves as "Jews for Jesus", they deny being deceptive.

This claim itself is not true, as many of their missionaries are not Jews. In addition, they are often not totally up-front about their beliefs. While focusing on the claim that Jesus was the Messiah, their actual belief is that Jesus was god incarnate, the second person of the Christian Trinity. Although Jews for Jesus rejects the validity of rabbinic teachings, they use many practices instituted by these same rabbis in their evangelistic presentations. Their primary deception is promoting Christianity as Jewish, and because of these tactics, many Christian groups condemn them. The Long Island Council of Churches accused Jews for Jesus of "engaging in subterfuge and dishonesty" and of "mixing religious symbols in ways that distort their essential meaning."

Today's missionaries promote the deceptive message that "It's Jewish to believe in Jesus."

WHAT ARE THE JEWISH ANSWERS TO THEIR CHALLENGES?

QUESTION: Why don't you believe in Jesus?
ANSWER: Although Jesus claimed to be the Messiah, he died without fulfilling the Biblical criteria that define the Messiah. The essential concept of the Messiah is of a wise and righteous king who will reign over a restored Jewish homeland and bring about a utopian world of universal peace and universal knowledge of G-d. (Isaiah 11:1-9; Jeremiah 33:14-16; Ezekiel 34:23-30, 37:24-28; Micah 4:1-4; Zechariah 8:23; Psalm 86:9 and more.) In light of Jesus' failure to fulfill these and numerous other prophesies, early Christianity proposed that Jesus would return in the future and bring about a redeemed world. Aside from the fact that this claim could be made for any failed Messiah, this concept simply does not appear anywhere in the Jewish Bible.

Furthermore, the Jewish belief in G-d as absolutely one and non-corporeal (Deuteronomy 4:12,15,35; 6:4; Isaiah 43:10-11, 45:5-6, 46:9) makes it impossible to accept the Christian belief that Jesus was god incarnate. The Torah warns us against worshipping a concept of G-d that our ancestors didn't know (Deuteronomy 13:3,7,14) and our ancestors had no concept of a Trinitarian Deity.

QUESTION: Did you know that the Jewish Bible contains many passages proving that Jesus was the Messiah?
ANSWER: This claim is baseless. Christians believe in Jesus as a matter of faith, but there is nothing in the Torah that can be used to prove this belief. Many Christian scholars acknowledge this fact. Some of the "prooftexts" used by missionaries are based upon mistranslations. For example, their claim that the Jewish scriptures contain a reference to the Messiah being born to a virgin has been repudiated by almost all modern Christian translations of the Bible.

Most missionary "prooftexts" are quoted out-of-context and are based upon circular reasoning. Christian missionary Walter Riggans states in his 1995 book entitled Yehoshua Ben David, "Let me repeat this point, there is no self-evident blueprint in the Hebrew Bible which can be said to ambiguously point to Jesus." Some "proofs" cited by missionaries are actually based upon texts that are totally fabricated.

QUESTION: But didn't Jesus perform miracles, and don't many Christians experience miracles today?
ANSWER: The Jewish Bible never teaches that we will be able to identify the Messiah by the miracles he will do. The reason is that even false prophets may have the ability to perform miracles (Deuteronomy 13:2-5). Even the Christian scriptures acknowledge that false Messiahs can perform supernatural miracles (Matthew 24:24).

Biblical "prooftexts" used by missionaries are based upon circular reasoning, quoting verses out-of-context and mistranslation.

Miracles cannot prove that a particular religion is true because people of all religious faiths experience them. This is also true of subjective feelings of joy and spiritual fulfillment. No religion has a monopoly on these, either. Furthermore, Jews don't necessarily accept all of the stories in the Christian scriptures as historically true. Interestingly, even Jews for Jesus' publications maintain that many claims of the miraculous by contemporary Christians are highly questionable.

QUESTION: How will you get forgiven for your sins today without Temple sacrifices?
ANSWER: It is an error to think that animal sacrifices were the essential way of dealing with our personal failures. None of the Biblical prophets taught that animal sacrifices were indispensable in order to be forgiven for our sins. As a matter of fact, the prophets constantly berated people who mistakenly thought that sacrifices, in and of themselves, can attain forgiveness (Isaiah 1:11-20; Amos 5:22-24; Psalm 51:17-19*; Jeremiah 7:1-10; Micah 6:6-8).

The Bible clearly teaches that the only way of atoning for sin is through repentance – a process of transformation that includes acknowledging our wrongdoing and confessing it to G-d, feeling regret, making restitution if we harmed someone, resolving to improve our behaviour, returning to G-d and praying for forgiveness (II Chronicles 7:14; Ezekiel chapters 18 and 33; Jeremiah 36:3; Isaiah 55:6-7 and Jonah 3:10).

The Bible's sin offering was only mandated for unintentional sins (Leviticus 4) and only when the Temple was standing in Jerusalem. Someone too poor to offer an animal could bring fine flour to the Temple (Leviticus 5:11-12). The sin offering was supposed to be an outward symbol of the person's inner change; it didn't secure forgiveness by itself. Today, in the absence of the Temple, we reconnect with G-d in the wake of sin through sincere repentance (I Kings 8:46-50).

QUESTION: Did you know that you can have a personal relationship with G-d through Jesus?
ANSWER: Every person has a personal relationship with G-d because we are His creations and we all possess a Divine soul. All we need to do is turn to G-d with a sincere heart and this action awakens our intrinsic spiritual closeness with Him. The Bible teaches, "G-d is near to all who call upon Him, to all who call upon Him with sincerity" (Psalm 145:18).

The Bible never speaks of the need to approach G-d through an intermediary. The Bible's holiest people, such as Moses and King David, experienced deep intimacy with G-d directly, without believing in Jesus. Prayer, Torah study, acts of charity and kindness, and living in obedience to G-d's will are the means of developing closeness with Him.

UNDERSTANDING & DEALING WITH MISSIONARY TACTICS

Note: Missionary groups may not employ all of the following techniques. These are some of the tactics that you might encounter.

Famous scientist Louis Pasteur used to say, "Fortune favours the mind that is prepared." It is crucial to realize that missionaries operate as salespeople and not as educators. Knowing their techniques of influence and developing your own critical thinking skills is vital to resisting their overtures.

1. ASSUMING SUPERIORITY

Missionaries may attempt to elicit as many "I don't know" responses as possible in order to establish their superiority and credibility. Don't allow yourself to be intimidated. Bear in mind that they are not interested in a genuine exchange of ideas. Missionaries are driven by their agenda of attempting to sway you from your faith. Their "questions" are not really questions seeking an answer, but set-ups to their sales pitch. You can simply state that you would prefer to learn about Biblical concepts from someone who doesn't have a hidden agenda.

2. DECEPTION

Missionaries may claim to have traditional Jewish backgrounds with a solid Jewish education. All too often, this is an exaggeration or outright fabrication designed to establish their credibility. The implied message is that this Jew for Jesus came to accept Christianity after knowing and overcoming all the Jewish objections. Some missionaries may even present traditional Jewish objections to their position and then demonstrate how these objections lack substance. Don't expect to hear a fair or accurate presentation of the Jewish position from the missionary.

3. LOVE BOMBING

Salespeople often flatter and charm potential customers to prime their receptivity and clinch the sale. Someone's warmth and friendliness has nothing to do with the validity of their ideas or sales pitch.

4. COVER-UP

Missionaries may focus on issues where there is little resistance and may avoid revealing beliefs that are less palatable. For example, they may stress the idea of Jesus as the Messiah while avoiding the bottom-line Christian doctrine that Jesus was actually god incarnate. Missionaries may also gloss over their conviction that good people who don't accept Jesus will be consigned to eternal damnation in hell.

5. THE NUMBERS GAME

Some missionaries may inundate you with endless lists of verses from the Bible. Of course, truth is not determined by volume. They may claim that there are over 300 Biblical "proofs" for their position. A careful examination of the passages – in context – will immediately refute their presentation. They may hide behind the numbers and say, "You may be right, but if you look at all the 'proofs' together, they are pretty impressive." It's important to remember that numerous weak pieces of evidence don't become stronger by combining them. 300 x 0 is still 0!

6. MANIPULATIVE LOGIC

Occasionally, missionaries may try to force you into accepting a proposition with false premises. One popular example is the assertion that "Jesus was either a lunatic, a liar or the Messiah." Missionaries assume that you won't feel comfortable with the first two options, and you'll accept the third. Of course, there are other possible explanations, such as Jesus sincerely believed he was the Messiah, but he turned out to be mistaken. This scenario is consistent with Jesus' dying words related in the Christian scriptures, "My G-d, my G-d, why have You forsaken me?" (Matthew 27:46).

7. EXPLOITING AMBIGUITY

We live in a confusing and frustrating world where reality is more often gray than black and white. Sometimes, missionaries may attempt to intensify your anxieties and insecurities by focusing on issues about which you feel powerless, such as terrorism, war, rampant immorality, illness and your own mortality. Or, they may play on the guilt you feel over a personal failure. Then, they offer simplistic answers to these critical problems. The lure and comfort of certainty can sometimes interfere with our normal instinct to verify their claims.

8. SHORT-CIRCUITING THOUGHT

Some missionaries may denigrate your desire to carefully analyze and evaluate their claims by stating, "You rely too much on your head – you have to open your heart!" The Torah never tells us to base our critical decisions upon our emotions. Our Torah always warns us to think and use our minds because our hearts can often lead us astray. Another tactic the missionaries use is to pressure you for a quick commitment, such as, "What is preventing you from accepting Jesus into your heart right now?"

9. PROVOKING US TO JEALOUSY

Most Jews who convert to Christianity never experienced Judaism as a real spiritual path – as a way of developing a personal relationship with G-d. Missionaries readily exploit this weakness by introducing potential converts to their enthusiastic worship services full of music and emotion. Bear in mind that a person's passion does not prove the truth of their beliefs. Every religion has adherents who have profound spiritual experiences and intense worship. The great tragedy of our times is that far too many Jews are unaware of this vital potential within their own faith.

> It is tragic that too many Jews are unaware of the profound meaning and spirituality within their own faith.

10. PRESUPPOSITION

A common technique employed by missionaries is to throw out the challenge, "Why don't you pray to Jesus and ask him to reveal himself to you, or give you a sign?" This is a manipulative tactic to preempt thoughtful consideration and maneuver you to tacitly accept their position. And, of course, missionaries will interpret virtually anything that happens to you as a divine sign, as something "meant to be."

A "Hebrew Christian" congregation in Toronto uses an authentic Torah scroll at their "Shabbat service".

PRACTICAL RECOMMENDATIONS

• Missionaries working with organizations like Jews for Jesus are well-trained, like an aggressive sales force, to push their product. They are taught to overcome all your objections and "close the sale". It is unlikely that you will be able to reason with them. Therefore, JEWS FOR JUDAISM strongly recommends that you avoid trying, unless you're thoroughly schooled in the relevant biblical and theological issues. A polite but firm, "No thank you." is the most appropriate response.

• Resist the temptation to respond angrily or with hostility because this reaction only bolsters their determination. Remember, although you may feel offended by their activities, they are not behaving in this way to offend you. For the most part, Jewish converts to Christianity are not villains, but the unfortunate victims of Jewish educational and spiritual malnutrition.

• Please report any missionary activity to JEWS FOR JUDAISM and their staff and trained volunteers will respond.

• The most effective way to counter the efforts of predatory missionaries is to make ourselves, our families and our communities less vulnerable. Missionaries can only be successful where there is an educational and spiritual vacuum. It is vital that all Jews have a meaningful Jewish education that leads to a profound appreciation for the wisdom and beauty of Judaism. Obviously, intellectual knowledge of Judaism alone isn't enough. We must bring the teachings and spirituality of Judaism into our hearts, our homes and our daily lives. When our lives are enriched by Jewish living, when we embrace our Judaism with passion, we become inoculated against the missionary threat and are less likely to stray to alien faiths.

• We realize that not knowing how to answer all the questions posed by missionaries seeking to convert you can be frustrating. This booklet is only a brief introduction to issues you may want to explore on a deeper level. JEWS FOR JUDAISM has an extensive array of educational materials and offers stimulating speakers and classes throughout the year. We are available to answer your questions. As well, we provide counseling to families dealing with a loved one who has embraced another faith, and we have been successful in helping these people return to their families and to Judaism.
